The following citation is made, with some freedom, from the Sept. For the ἰσὺν of Gen. xxii. 18, we have here πατριαί. Both expressions, however, come to the same thing; πατριαί denoting (like the φυλαί of the similar passage, Gen. xii. 3) nations derived from one common ancestor; consequently the terms are convertible; the same Hebrew term נַחֲשִׁימָה being rendered by both; see my note on Thucyd. iii. 65, 14. Here, then, the Apostle means to affirm the same thing as St. Paul, Gal. iii. 16, that by the Messiah, as the descendant of Abraham, shall all nations be blessed; much more shall they his own people. Ἐν before τῷ σπέρματι, received, on strong authority, by almost every Critical Editor, I find in almost all the Lamb. and Mus. copies.

²⁶ ὑμῖν πρῶτον] The sense of these words will become clearer by supplying the Particle οὖν, expressed in the Æthiop. Version and in two MSS., 'unto you, then'; which very aptly introduces the conclusion from what has been said.—Ἀναστήσας. The word is here used as supra v. 22. ii. 30, and infra vii. 37, and Deut. xviii. 18, of the providential bringing into existence of the Prophets. Εὐλογοῦντα ὑμᾶς is best taken as put in apposition, or as standing for ὡς εὐλογ., 'as one who should bless you, make you happy.' At the next words, ἐν τῷ ἀποστ.—ὑμῶν, the verb may be taken either transitively or intransitively: the latter is supported by the ancient Versions and Expositors; the former by most modern, and espec. recent Expositors. If adopted, I would render, 'by turning each of you,' and not 'while turning,' as Alford. However, I still prefer the intransitive sense, 'by each of you turning'; so Calv., who well remarks, 'Doctrinam penitentis iterum commendat, ut discamus sub Christi benedictione includere vitam novitatem.' So supra v. 19. Wycl. and Tyndale, 'on your turning each one of you from your iniquities.'

IV. There is now narrated the result of this dissemination of Gospel truth,—namely, that the Sadducees now joined cordially with the Pharisees, since the testimony of the Apostles to the resurrection of Jesus was subversive of their doctrines; and therefore they readily aided in attempts to strangle the truth in its infancy, by persecuting unto the death the Apostles, as they had before done Jesus Christ himself; and, as a first step, they apprehend and imprison the Apostles Peter and John.

1. ἐπέστησαν αὐτοῖς] 'supervenerunt illis,' 'came upon them,' by surprise. See my Lex. in v. On ὁ στρατηγὸς τοῦ ἱεροῦ, see note on Luke xxii. 4.

2. διαπονοῦμενοι] For λητούμενοι, 'being vexed,' or 'annoyed.' The words διὰ τὸ διδάσκειν αὐ. τὸν λαόν refer to the Priests; and καταγγέλλειν—νεκρῶν to the Sadducees. Ἐν τῷ Ἰησοῦ, by or in, i. e. 'by the example of Jesus,' as exemplified in Jesus.

4. ἐγενήθη—χιλ. πέντε.] The Commentators are not agreed whether this number is inclusive of the 3000 before converted, or exclusive of them. Yet no persons conversant in the idiom of the Greek language can fail to perceive that the former is the sense intended. Ἐγενήθη signifies was become; a signif. of γίνεσθαι often occurring in the New Test. and LXX. Ἀνδρῶν signifies not men, but persons of both sexes; it being put, as often, for ἀνθρώπων.

5—14. The examination of the Apostles before the Sanhedrim; the speech of Peter.

5. αὐτῶν] meaning the Jews.—ἀρχ. καὶ πρεσβ. κ. γρ., meaning the Sanhedrim. See Matt. ii. 5. xxvi. 59, and infra v. 21.

6. ἐκ γίνουσι ἀρχ.] Some understand the chiefs of the 24 Sacerdotal classes. Others, more properly, it should seem, the family of those who had lately served the office of High Priest. For besides that the former interpretation does violence to the phrase, this is strongly confirmed by a similar use of the very same phrase in Josephus, Antt. xv. 3. 1, where, speaking of Ananel, the first High Priest appointed by Herod, he says he was ἀρχιερατικοῦ γένους, i. e. of the High-Priestly race, being descended from an ancestor who had borne the office of High Priest,—namely, as I understand it, among the Jews in Babylonia, of the Eastern dispersion. So that there is no occasion, with some, to read οὐκ ἀρχ., merely because Josephus says he was ἱερεὺς ἐκ τῶν ἀσημοτέρων. He might be a priest of the lower class, and yet be of Arch-priestly descent.

7. ἐν ποίᾳ δυνάμει—ὀνόματι.] To determine the sense of this passage, we must ascertain the scope of the interrogation. Now ἐποιήσατε τοῦτο might refer, as some say it does, to the general conduct of the Apostles in their ministry. But from ver. 9 it is plain that it refers to the miraculous cure lately performed. Ἐν ποίῳ ὀνόματι further illustrate the sense. The name of a person is indeed often put for the person himself. See also iii. 6, 16. Thus it probably means, 'by the power of such a person,' as in Joseph. Antt. xviii. 8. 1. But as it is certain that the Jews believed very wonderful works, even miracles, to be performed by magic arts and incantation (i. e. invoking the names of certain angels or illustrious Patriarchs), the full sense of ὀνομα may be retained. At any rate τοῦτο must mean the miracle.

9. εἰ ἡμεῖς σήμερον ἀνακρ.] El, siquidem, 'if, as it seems,'—a signif. found often in the New Test., Sept., and Class. writers, and here to be preferred to the ordinary one, as being more energetic and pointed. Ἀνακρίνεσθαι is here a forensic term, signifying to be examined by interrogation. Εὐεργεσία ἀνθρώπου ἀσθεν., is for εὐεργ. εἰς ἀνθρώπου ἀσθενη., 'on account of the benefit done to the sick man,' a Genit. of object, as in Pindar, Isthm. vi. 102, εὐεργεσίας εἶναι ἀγαπᾶται. At ἐν τίνι supply ὀνόματι. Comp. vv. 7, 10. Σέσωται, 'was made well,' as Matt. ix. 21.

11. See note on Matt. xxi. 42, and notes.
12. οὐκ ἔστιν—ἡ σωτηρία.] Many eminent Commentators, from Whitby downwards, have argued from the context that ἡ σωτηρία means, 'this healing;' and interpret σωθῆναι, 'to be restored to health;' a sense found elsewhere, but here inadmissible, because the verb cannot have a sense different from that of the nom. ἡ σωτηρία just before, which cannot mean 'the healing;' such a signif. of the word being found nowhere either in the Scriptural or the Classical writers. The use of the Article by no means requires it; for to render, 'the healing' in question, yields a very harsh and jejune sense. Indeed, there is no proof that the Article is here meant to be emphatic. I know of no passage in the New Test. where it has such a force, but several where the noun is used in its most abstract sense; in which case the force of the Art. is merged in that of the noun. So John iv. 22. Rom. xi. 11. Heb. vi. 9. Rev. vii. 10. ἡ σωτηρία καὶ ἡ δόξα καὶ ἡ τιμὴ — τῷ Θεῷ: and so in Sept., Ps. iii. 8, τοῦ Κυρίου ἡ σωτηρία, and elsewhere in Joseph. Bell. i. 20, 1, τῆς σωτηρίας. Mr. Alford says that the Article must imply our salvation. He should rather have said may; and even that is improbable, the use being rare in the New Test. in the case of σωτ., though it is not unfrequent in the Class. writers. In the passage of Josephus adduced, the pronoun αὐτοῦ is expressed. I know of no instance in Joseph. where ἡ σωτηρία means 'our preservation.' That ἡ σωτηρία must here be understood of salvation, not of 'healing,' is certain from the words following, ἐν ᾧ δεῖ σωθῆναι ἡμᾶς, which show the σωτηρία in question to be general, and therefore spiritual and eternal.

— καταλαβόμενοι] 'having perceived,' or 'learnt,' a sense of the word occurring v. 34. xxv. 25. Eph. iii. 18.—Ἀγράμματοι, 'unlettered,' i. e. 'ignorant of, or but slightly versed in literature,' especially that kind of it which the Jews alone prized, namely, of the Scriptures, τὰ γράμματα, as explained by their Rabbinical interpreters; comp. John vii. 15. By the other expression ἰδιῶται are meant 'private persons,' as opposed to those who held any office, ecclesiastical or civil, with an implied notion of unskilled, in opposition to skilled; as I have shown in my note on Thucyd. vi. 72. 2. With the phrase ἀγράμματοι καὶ ἰδιῶται Valcknaer compares Athen. p. 176, ἰδιώτης καὶ ἀνυλφάβητος.—Ἐπεγίνωσκον, 'knew by observation,' 'recognized,' as in Matt. xiv. 35. Mark vi. 33. Luke xxiv. 16, 31.

— σὺν τῷ Ἰησοῦ ἦσαν] 'had been adherents of Jesus,' as Mark xiv. 67, καὶ σὺ μετὰ Ἰησοῦ ἦσθα. The idiom was probably one of common life and colloquial phraseology.

¹⁷ ἀλλ'] 'however,' 'nevertheless.' A sense not unfrequent either in the Scriptural or Classical writers. At διανεμηθῇ supply τούτο, scil. τὸ σημεῖον, the report of this miracle. Thus διανεμίσθαι, which properly signifies 'to be distributed among several,' will here, as used of a report, have the sense to be spread abroad. Or rather, we may by τούτο understand 'this matter,' namely, respecting the Messiahship of Jesus and the doctrine taught in his name. And in διανειμ. we may suppose a medical metaphor, with allusion to those ulcers called ἱερυντοικά, which are said νίμεισθαι, ἐκνίμεισθαι, and πρόσω νίμεισθαι, and accordingly διανεμίσθαι. Thus ἐπὶ πλείον διανεμηθῇ will mean 'spread in popular.' Compare Virg. Georg. iii. 469, 'priusque Dira per incautum seipsum contagia vulgus.' See 2 Tim. ii. 16, 17.

— ἀπειλῇ ἀπειλησώμεθα, &c.] The full sense is, 'let us strictly enjoin them under menace of punishment.' This use of ἀπειλ., followed by an ἰψίμ., is so rare, that even the best Lexicons scarcely adduce an example. I have, however, noted it in Joseph. Antt. x. 7, 4, 'Ὅ δὲ ἀπειλεῖ (scil. αὐτοῖς) πρὸς τοὺς πολέμιους φυγεῖν, and Theocrit. Idyll. xxiv. 16, ἀπειλήσασα φαγεῖν βρέφος Ἡρακλῆα.

— ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματι τούτῳ] 'upon,' i. e. resting on the name and authority of Jesus, as the primary Teacher and Author. So Demosthenes, 495, 7, ταῦτ' ἐπὶ τῷ τῶν θεῶν ὀνόματι ποιεῖν.

19—22. The Apostles' reply on their dismissal. 19. εἰ δίκαιον—Θεοῦ] So Plato makes Socrates similarly address his judges, by πίσσομαι τῷ Θεῷ μᾶλλον ἢ ὑμῖν;

20. οὐ δυνάμεθα—μὴ λαλεῖν] The full sense is: 'We, for our parts, cannot [consistently with what is right and just]; (for, as Papius says, 'quæ facta lædunt pietatem, nec facere nos posse credendum est.') 'Not speak' = 'but speak'; as in Aristoph. Ran. 42, οὗτοι δύναμαι μὴ γαλᾶν. This is one of those few passages in which two negatives do not strengthen the negation, but have an affirmative force. The Grammarians account for it on the principle that the negatives belong to two different verbs. But, in a case like the present, that explains nothing. It is better to say that the two negatives belong, strictly speaking, to two different clauses, and are suspended on finite verbs, or Infinitives, either expressed or understood.

21. προσαπειλ.] 'Having threatened them, in addition to' the previous interdiction.

—μηδὲν εὐρίσκ. τὸ πῶς, &c.] lit., 'finding nothing ('no method') [as to] ἵκω, &c. The words διὰ τὸν λόγον intimate where the difficulty as to the 'how' lay, namely, 'on account of the people,' lest a popular tumult might be excited by the attempt.

22. πλειόν. τισσ.] for πλ. ἢ τισσ., as in Thucyd. vi. 95, where see my note, and comp. Ælian, V. H. xiii. 4, τισσαρ. ἑτῶν γεγονότα. In τὸ σημ. τ. l. there is a Genit. of explanation.

24—30. Supplicatory Hymn, or Prayer, uttered by the Church at large; a noble composition, and in its solemnity of character worthy of the immediate inspiration of the Holy Spirit.

23. τοὺς ἰδίους] i. e. 'their associates,' the other Apostles and the disciples at large; as xxiv. 23. John xv. 19. So Philo 630, ἰθαρυνοὺς τοὺς ἰδ.

24. σὺ ὁ Θεὸς ὁ ποιῆς.] 'Thou art God, who hast made heaven, &c., as being understood, and not, as Expositors generally think, the sense left suspended without termination at ver. 26. Besides, the former mode is more agreeable to the context. Nor is this clause a mere ascription of praise to God generaliter, but is to be accommodated to the present case. See the able note of Calvin, in loc., which is prefaced with the remark, 'Sic enim Dei potentiam in mundi totius officio agnoscunt, ut simul accomodent ad presentem usum. . . . Promissionem deinde adiungunt, atque, hæc duo, veluti fundamenta, jaciunt fiduciam ad precandum.' Thus they express their sense of his full power to deliver them, and their entire reliance on his sacred promise to aid in time of need like this.

25. As they had, in the first sentence of the prayer, expressed their sense of God's power to save them, his right to dispose of them as he saw fit for his own glory, and their faith that he would, so, in the second, they appeal to a prophecy; thereby intimating their just expectation of aid in the work they had in hand. They plead that this was a thing foretold through God's prophet the Psalmist; that the same God who now permitted this tumult, and opposition to the introduction of the Gospel, had caused him to prophesy of Christ. So Calvin, 'Jam descendunt ad secundum membrum, nihil se petere nisi quod se facturum testatus est Deus. Ita ejus potentiam adiungitur voluntas, ut plena sit impetrandi fiducia.' The words present an exact quotation from the Sept. In ἐφρύαξαν there is a metaphor taken from the snorting, and other sounds of impatience and rage, emitted by high-mettled horses, and therefore very applicable to proud and tyrannical men. In καὶ ἐμελέτ. κενά there is a sensus prægnans; q. d. 'Formed plans which have turned out vain.' Comp. the proverb in Suidas, κενὰ κενοὶ λογιζονται. As much as to say, 'Why do they rebel against the Messiah, why endeavour to shake off his yoke?'

26. παρέστησαν] Meaning (as the parallelism requires), 'they stood side by side for mutual help in opposition to'; meaning, 'they banded together against.' The Messianic import of Ps. ii. has been ably vindicated against the objections of the modern Jews (for the ancient Jews knew better), the Socinians, Arians, and other free-thinking Expositors, by Hoffm., p. 55 seqq., to whom, and to Venema on the Psalm, I would refer my reader.

27. συνήχθησαν γὰρ, &c.] Here 'the heathen, the peoples, the kings of the earth, and the rulers (that is, all the rebellious personages of the second Psalm), are brought forward, as fulfilling whatsoever it was pre-appointed they should do.' (Bp. Jebb.) I have, in deference to the judgment of the recent Critical Editors, now received ἐν τῇ πόλει ταύτῃ, since to the strong authority they adduce, I can add all the Lamb. and several Mus. copies, with Trin. Coll. B, x. 16, confirmed by the ancient Versions; and internal evidence is rather in favour of the words.

28. ποιῆσαι ὅσα, &c.] The sense is: 'For the purpose of doing—what? why no other than what thy overruling power and predisposing wisdom pre-determined to be done.' (Bp. Jebb.)

29. The sense is: 'And, as thy wise counsel pre-determined that, through the confederacy of Jews and Gentiles, of kings and rulers, Christ should suffer, so let the same wise counsel be now made conspicuous, in the undaunted preaching of Christ crucified.' (Bp. Jebb.) Ἐπίδε, i. e. 'so look upon their threats, as to ward off their execution, and grant us deliverance.'

30. ἐν τῇ τῇ χεὶρά σου ἔκτ.] lit. 'in the stretching forth of thine hand,' while thou art stretching forth thine hand (i. e. exerting thy power) for healing, (and while) signs and wonders are performing; thus asking that God would continue the working of miracles, through them, as an evidence to the people of the truth of the religion they were promulgating.

31. ἰσαλῦθι] This term is well adapted to suggest the idea of an earthquake; a phenomenon regarded both by Jews and Gentiles as, under certain circumstances, betokening Divine presence and favour. So a Rabbinical writer cited by Schoettg., 'totus ille locus commotus est.' See also other examples in Schoettg. Virg. Æn. iii. 90. Ovid. Metam. xv. 672. So Jamblichus, de Myster. ii. 4 (de apparat. Deorum), τὴν τε γῆν μηκέτι δύνασθαι ἐστάναι, αὐτῶν (scil. τῶν θεῶν) κατιόντων. Here, however, the idea must be supposed derived from Scriptural sources, in such passages as Ps. xxix. 8. lxxviii. 8. Isa. ii. 19. Ezek. xxxviii. 19, and many others.

— Πνεῦματος ἁγίου] meaning, 'the influence of the Holy Spirit,' &c.

32—37. We have here a sketch of the state of the Christian Church at that time, especially as respected their holy Charity.

32. ἦν ἡ καρδιά—μία] A proverbial description of close amity, as in Plutarch: Δύο φίλοι, ψυχὴ μία, and other similar expressions. Οὐκ ἔλεγεν ἴδιον, 'did not call them his own,' or allege that as a reason why his poor brethren were not to be assisted therewith. This shows that their property was really considered as their own, and consequently that the expression κοινά in the words following must be taken with limitation; meaning that they were common, not by possession, but by custom and application for use. See note supra ii. 45.

33. μεγάλῃ δυν.] Wolf, Heinr., and Kuinoel think that the expression is to be understood only of the power of the Apostles' eloquence, &c. But, although I would not exclude the force of that artificial, but impressive, eloquence, which, founded in conviction, supported by the consciousness of Divine favour, and with the aid of the Holy Spirit, would give their words an effect rarely to be found in the most polished oratory; yet I must maintain, that there is chiefly meant in the expression an allusion to what would, above every thing else, enable them to speak with such effect,—namely, the miracles which they were occasionally enabled to work. In short, the expression may be said to denote force as regarded the speakers, and efficacy as respected the hearers.

— χάρις τε—αὐτοῖς] Some Commentators understand χάρις of the favour of God; others, of that of the Jewish people; q. d. 'the favour of the people rested upon them.' But though this be countenanced by ii. 47, yet there the interpretation first mentioned seems preferable; because if the αὐτοῖς be referred to the Apostles, it will give a reason for the force and efficacy of their preaching. Perhaps, however, the αὐτοῖς is to be referred to the people at large; χάρις being understood of the grace of God, through the Holy Spirit. So Luke ii. 40, καὶ χάρις Θεοῦ ἦν ἐπ' αὐτό. Indeed, thus alone can the γὰρ of the following clause be accounted for; which Translators and Commentators suppose, merely to mean καὶ, though it has its frequent force, that of exemplification; and here serving to prove the working of God's grace in their souls; q. d. Thus, for example, there was not one, &c., because such as had possessions or property sold, &c. Accordingly, this passage is one of that class where there are two γὰρ's introducing two clauses, one dependent on the other; as in Matt. x. 19, 20. Mark vi. 52. John v. 21, 22. Acts ii. 15.

34. τὰς τιμὰς τῶν πιπρ.] lit. 'the prices of the possessions that were sold.'—πιπρ. is not, as Alf. says, put loosely for πρᾶξιντων. Thus we find the same tense in the purest Classical writers, as Demosth., and others, cited by Wets.

35. παρὰ τοὺς πόδας τ. &c.] This may, I am now of opinion, be taken literally, of the sum being placed at their feet (many examples of which are adduced by Grot., Pricæus, and Wets.) in token of reverence. But it does not follow, that, as Mr. Alf. thinks, the Apostles, like the Roman Prætor, sat on a raised seat, on the step of which, at their feet, the money was laid.

— διεδίδοδο, verb impers., 'distribution was made.' Comp. Jos. Ant. xvi. 2, 2, τοῖς δὲ ἀλλοῖς καθὼ δεικνύειν ἐκάστοις, 'as there might be need to each.'

37. ἀγροῦ] 'an estate.' That, as a Levite, Barnabas should be a land-proprietor, is not inconsistent with the Divine regulation respecting the Levites, Numb. xviii. 20 seqq.; for that merely has regard to the Levites as a tribe (as such they were to have no landed property appropriated to them out of the division of Canaan); it has nothing to do with individuals, who were not prevented from holding lands by purchase or inheritance, whether in Judæa, or in foreign countries. That they had begun to possess land at an early period appears from Jer. xxxii. 7. Of χρήμα in the sense 'money,' which is rather rare, see my Lex. in v.

V. To the account of liberality given in the case of Barnabas, is subjoined another of the contrary in that of Ananias and Sapphira. The crime of which these two persons were guilty, and which brought down so awful a visitation on them, must, at the most moderate estimate, be regarded, even on principles of natural religion, as one of no ordinary magnitude,—being a compound of fraud and hypocrisy. So Cicero, Off. i. 13: 'Totius injustitiæ nulla capitalior est, quam eorum qui cum maximè fallunt, id agunt ut viri boni esse videantur.' The older Commentators, indeed, consider the crime in the light of sacrilege, which was one punishable with death; but a just distinction is made by Mede between the species facti and the circumstantiæ facti,—namely, hypocrisy and desire of vain-glory, &c., which was perhaps the chief motive that tempted them to the offence; for, as Meyer well observes, their aim was, to get for themselves the credit of holy love and zeal by one portion of the price received, whereas they had selfishly kept back the other portion for themselves. In fact, they wished to serve two masters, but to appear to serve only One. At any rate, the offence well merited the punishment with which it was visited,—a punishment, indeed, more especially necessary in the then state of things, in order to prevent the Christian religion from being discredited by the hypocrisy of worldly-minded professors.

2. ἐνοσφίσατο ἀπὸ τῆς τ.] Supply μέρος, 'appropriated part to his own use.' This construction with the Genit. and ἀπὸ is rare; but another example is found in Josh. vii. 1, ἐνοσφίσαντο ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀναθήματος.

— συνειδυίας] Supply τοῦτο, both expressed in Thucyd., vol. ii. 92. 7, ed. Bekk., συνειδυῖς τοῖς ἑτέροις τὸ ἐπιβουλεύμα.

3. ἐκλήρωσεν—τὴν καρδίαν σου] Many recent Commentators, comparing this with that at v. 4, εἶπον ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ σου τὸ πρᾶγμα τοῦτο, ῥωσεν ὁ Σατανᾶς τὴν καρδίαν σου, ψεύσασθαι σε τὸ Πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον, καὶ ὀνομάσασθαι ἀπὸ τῆς τιμῆς τοῦ χωρίου ; ^{c Num. 30. 2. Deut. 32. 21. Eccles. 5. 4.} ⁴ Οὐχὶ μένον, σοὶ ἔμενε ; καὶ πραθὲν, ἐν τῇ σῇ ἐξουσίᾳ ὑπῆρχε ; Τί ὅτι ἔθου ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ σου τὸ πᾶγμα τοῦτο ; οὐκ ἐψεύσω ἀνθρώποις ἀλλὰ τῷ Θεῷ. ⁵ Ἀκούων δὲ ὁ Ἀνανίας τοὺς λόγους

τοὺς ἀκούοντας ταῦτα. ⁶ Ἀναστάντες δὲ οἱ νεώτεροι συνέστειλαν take it to mean no more than 'Why was thy heart filled with that diabolical plan?' But this is unjustifiably sinking the personality of Satan, and his power, as well as will, to suggest evil thoughts to the minds of men. The two expressions above mentioned are by no means inconsistent; for while the assaults of Satan incite the hearts of men to sin, their own natural corruption is always ready to suggest evil thoughts. Nor will there be any difficulty in the interrogation διὰ τί, &c., if we consider that the full force of πληροῦν τὴν καρδίαν τινός, which is πληροφορεῖσθαι ποιεῖν, 'to have full possession of,' implies (as we know Satan's power is limited) such a yielding to the temptation, as, while it argues the free agency of man, makes him at the same time strictly accountable for the act. Ψεύσασθαι must here denote 'to attempt to deceive' by a lie; the attempt being, as often, put for the performance.

⁴. μένον] 'while remaining' [yours], i. e. unsold.—Σοὶ ἔμενε. A dativus commodi, 'remained at thy disposal,' to sell or to keep. At πραθὲν we must supply χωρίον: but when repeated as the nominative to ὑπῆρχε, we must take it, by meton., for the χρῆμα or money produced by it. So the Pesch. Syr. well expresses it, 'the price thereof.' Here I agree with Mede, De Dieu, and Wolf, in considering the sentence as consisting of two clauses, each interrogative (as at Luke xxi. 7, πότε οὖν ταῦτα ἵσται; καὶ τί τὸ σημεῖον ὅταν μάλλιν ταῦτα γίνεσθαι;) which suits well with the διαιρέτης and πάθος of the address; though, perhaps, the latter clause may be declarative; a variety not unsuitable to the nature of the address, and of which examples might be adduced from Thucydides.

—ἔθου ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ] for εἰς τὴν καρδίαν. This answers to the Hebrew phrase בְּהַרְוּתוֹ, which the Sept. generally expresses by τιθέναι εἰς τὴν καρδίαν, though sometimes by τιθ. ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ, as in Dan. i. 8 (where one or two copies have ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ, the rest εἰς or ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ). Mal. ii. 2. Ezra vii. 10, 'Ἐδράς ἰδῶκεν ἐν καρδίᾳ αὐτοῦ, where for ἰδῶκεν, which cannot be right, should, I doubt not, be read ἰθῆκεν, and the words might easily be confounded. As to the reading there of the Ed. Compl. ἐτοίμασε τὴν καρδίαν αὐτοῦ, it is evidently a mere gloss, though not on ἰδῶκεν, but on ἰθῆκεν, thus serving to attest the existence of that reading in certain copies; and, indeed, it is a good version of the Heb. רָצַח. Comp. 2 Sam. xiii. 20, μὴ θῇς εἰς τὴν καρδίαν, 'set not thine heart.'

—οὐκ ἐψεύσω—Θεῷ] From a comparison of this verse with the preceding one (where Ananias is said to have lied against the Holy Ghost), as well as several other passages [John iii. 6, compared with 1 John v. 4. Acts xiii. 4. 2 Tim.

iii. 16, with 2 Pet. i. 21. John vi. 45, with 1 Cor. ii. 13. iii. 16 seqq. with 1 Cor. vi. 19], the best Theologians have in all ages justly inferred that the Holy Ghost is God.

The οὐκ—ἀλλὰ is by most recent Commentators rendered non tam—quam; a not unfrequent idiom, but perhaps not to be sought here.

⁵. ἐξέψυξε] Supply πνεῦμα. See my Lex. in v. That the death of Ananias and Sapphira was preternaturally effected by a Divine judgment, and not, what the Neologians attempt to show, from excessive fear, or horror, at the thought of detection, is manifest from the very circumstances of the case. For that so extraordinary an occurrence should have happened to two persons at once, thus, as Mr. Alford says, 'supposing a man and his wife of the same temperament, were in the highest degree improbable. As to what has been urged, that the Apostle did not foresee, threaten, or even allude to Ananias's death,—that admits of a satisfactory explanation; since whatever previous knowledge Peter might, by Divine inspiration, have to threaten the death of Ananias, it would have been, in the present circumstances of the Church, highly imprudent to have used it, as giving the magistracy that handle against the Apostles which they desired. And hence there is no cause for the wonder expressed by some, that the Sanhedrim should take no cognizance of the matter; since, from the prudent course pursued by the Apostle, it was impossible for them to have any hold upon him.

⁶. οἱ νεώτεροι] Called at ver. 10 οἱ νεανίσκοι, and supposed, by Hamm., Mosheim, and Kuin., to have been inferior Church officers (something like our Sacristans and Vergers) appointed to perform various duties,—such as sweeping and cleaning the church; preparing for the Lord's Supper, and the agapæ; attending at funerals, &c.—an opinion somewhat confirmed by the term νεανίσκοι, denoting, in Alexandrian Greek, servants, as in the Sept. Vers. of Jer. xiv. 3. No proofs, however, have been adduced of the existence of such officers at so very early a period as this; allusions to whom, had there been such, might have been expected to be found in the writings of the Apostolic Fathers. There is, indeed, no necessity to depart from the common interpretation, which supposes οἱ νεώτεροι to mean 'the younger males of the congregation present.' And that the same persons are, a little after, called οἱ νεανίσκοι, is no proof of the existence of such officers. It is most likely that the more laborious services of the Church were at that early period not appropriated to particular persons, as officers, but discharged by the younger men in rotation, and by a certain course.

— συνίστασαν is put for the usual term περίσσεια, used, both in the Class. writers and in the Sept.—an idiom, however, so rare, that I know of only two examples,—Eur. Troad. 376, ἐν πύλοις ('winding-sheets') συνιστάλυσαν, and 108, πολὺς ὄγκος συσταλλομένων ('shrouded') προγόνων.

Burial on the same day with the death was then (and still is) usual in the East, both with the heathens and the Jews; and I have in Recens. Synop. shown that the custom was not unknown among the Greeks of the earliest ages, having probably been introduced by the Cadmo-Phoenician colonists; see Eurip. Alc. 345. The custom of the ancient Jews had been continued by the modern. Mr. Alford thinks it was 'grounded on Num. xix. 11; though, as appears from Gen. xxiii., not used in earlier times.' But the first point is not made out; and as to the second, the case of Sarah was, from its circumstances, exceptional. It would seem that the corpse of Sarah was embalmed, &c., in nearly the Egyptian mode (on which see Sir G. Wilkinson's 'Ancient Egyptians'), and then deposited in the cave of Machpelah for preservation.

⁹ συνεφωνήθη ὑμῖν Conf. Joseph. Antt. xvii. 12, 2, θεασάμενος οὖν συμπνευσμὸν ἐπὶ ψευδολογία διδασκάλου καὶ μαθητοῦ.

— πειράσαι τὸ Πνεῦμα Κ. The full sense is, 'to try whether the Spirit of God would detect your hypocrisy and fraud.'

— οἱ πόδες τῶν θαψ. The Commentators regard this as a Hebraism (so 1 Kings xiv. 12. Conf. Joa. Antt. xviii. 11, 1) for the persons themselves, οἱ θάψαντες; the Hebrews often expressing a man by some member of his body instrumental to some action in question. I have, however, shown in Recens. Synop. (by references to Eurip. Hipp. 657. Orest. 1205. Suppl. 90, and Herc. Fur. 336) that this idiom is found among the Greek Class. writers. See note on Rom. x. 15.

⁹ καὶ ἐξοίσουσί σε This is not to be considered as a threat, much less (as Porphyry represents) an imprecation, but a prediction, i. e. 'will carry thee out.' Doubtless the same Holy Spirit which revealed to Peter the fraud, made known the punishment that would follow it; so that it is clear that the death was not, as the Rationalist Commentators say, the result of Sapphira's detection, but a judicial infliction, the occurrence of which was, we cannot doubt, in some way intimated to Peter by the Holy Spirit.

τέρατα ἐν τῷ λαῷ πολλά. καὶ ἦσαν ὁμοθυμαδὸν ἅπαντες ἐν τῇ στοᾷ Σολομῶνος¹³ τῶν δὲ λοιπῶν οὐδεὶς ἐτόλμα κολλᾶσθαι αὐτοῖς. ἀλλ' ἐμεγάλυνεν αὐτοὺς ὁ λαός¹⁴ (^b μᾶλλον δὲ προσ- ^{h ch. 2. 41.} ἐτίθεντο πιστεύοντες τῷ Κυρίῳ, πλήθη ἀνδρῶν τε καὶ γυναικῶν)¹⁵ ὥστε κατὰ τὰς πλατείας ἐκφέρειν τοὺς ἀσθενεῖς, καὶ τιθέναι ^{i ch. 19. 12.} ἐπὶ κλινῶν καὶ κραββάτων, ἵνα ἐρχομένου Πέτρου κἂν ἡ σκιὰ ἐπισκιάσῃ τινὲ αὐτῶν. ¹⁶ Συνήρχετο δὲ καὶ τὸ πλῆθος τῶν πέριξ πόλεων εἰς Ἱερουσαλὴμ, φέροντες ἀσθενεῖς καὶ ὄχλου- μένους ὑπὸ πνευμάτων ἀκαθάρτων· οἵτινες ἐθεραπεύοντο ἅπαντες.

τίαν. These, it is said, did not venture κολλᾶσθαι, i. e. προσέρχεσθαι, 'to approach' or 'come near them,' whether for interference or otherwise. For that κολλᾶσθαι and προσέρχεσθαι are synonymous terms, is plain from x. 28, ἀβιμαὴν ἵσταν ἀνδρὶ Ἰουδαίῳ, κολλᾶσθαι ἢ προσέρχεσθαι, &c. (where see note); and the former is here taken for the latter by the Pesch. Syr. Translator. The reason why they did not venture to do this may be attributed to the awe with which we find, from what precedes, the people had been struck by the miracles worked by the Apostles.

The next words ἀλλ' ἐμεγάλ. αὐτοὺς ὁ λαὸς may be rendered, 'But the people at large (as opposed to the Rulers) held them in great reverence.' Ver. 14 is parenthetical, and meant to show that this reverence had, in many cases, induced them to join the Christian society.

15. ὥστε] 'inasmuch that.'—κατὰ τὰς πλατείας, 'along the streets.' Of the two terms, κλιν. and κραββ., the former denotes a sort of 'light sick-bed,' formed of a mattress laid upon a very light frame, or bedstead; the latter a very small couch, light enough to be carried by two persons, and used (like the σκίμπος of the Greeks) for travelling, or the conveyance of the sick.

—ἵνα ἐρχομένου—αὐτῶν] The approval of this action, which was a superstitious one (as implying that the power of healing was inherent in the Apostles, and not, as it really was, adventitious, and procured by their prayers,) is by no means to be inferred, even if it were true that the persons in question were healed; for that would be procured by their faith, without the intervention of the Apostles. However, from what is said in the next verse and at xix. 12, it seems highly probable that some of the persons in question were healed; at least where their faith was strong enough to qualify them for that mercy. And in such a case the superstition, they may presume, would be forgiven, and the faith accepted.

16. συνήρχετο τὸ πλῆθος τῶν πέριξ πόλεων] Meaning, that 'the bulk of the population of the surrounding cities flocked to Jerusalem.'

—ὄχλ.] See note on the kindred phraseology, occurring at Luke vi. 18. It is plain that here, as elsewhere, the demoniacs are distinguished from the sick.

17, 18. So far we have read of the increase of the Church in the numbers of believers added to it, and of the various gifts and miracles by which it was distinguished; and, in a general way, the flourishing condition of Christ's kingdom. Now we have brought before us the mad fury of the wicked consequent thereupon, and the renewed persecutions exercised by the enemies of Christ towards his faithful flock.

17. ἀναστὰς] This is regarded by De Dieu and Kuin. as a Hebrew pleonasm; while Casaubon and Heuman, more rightly, take it for διεγερθεῖς, i. e. κινηθεῖς, scil. ἐπὶ τοῖς γινόμενοις. In the words following it is implied, though not expressly said, that the High Priest was a Sadducee. And that some of the High Priests (as well as most persons of high rank) were such, we learn from Josephus. Σὺν αὐτῷ seems to be for μετ' αὐτοῦ, denoting 'to be of any one's party.' See iv. 13, and note. Some, however, take οἱ σὺν αὐτῷ to denote 'those who were his colleagues' in his official duties, or of council with him. But those could not be many; and the πάντες seems to exclude that view. Αἵρεσις denotes, properly, a taking up any thing, as a choice, or an opinion; 2. the opinion so taken up, whether in religion or philosophy; 3. as here, the party maintaining it; in which sense it often occurs in the later Class. writers, espec. the Philosophers. Ζήλος here represents 'a combined feeling of envy, malice, and all uncharitableness,' on the cause of which see iv. 2, and note.

18. ἐν τηρήσει δημοσίᾳ is for εἰς τήρησιν δημ., 'the common prison,' as supra iv. 3.

20. σταθέντες ληλ.] There is no pleonasm, but σταθ. is a forensic term, used of those who are set up to speak, either as orators and advocates, or as prisoners pleading their own cause. See Acts xvii. 22. xxv. 18.

lage frequent in the Class. writers, for ρήματα ταῦτα τῆς ζωῆς, with allusion to the result of the religion of Jesus, as issuing in life and salvation. So in Acts xiii. 26, we have ὕμιν ὁ λόγος τῆς σωτηρίας ταύτης ἀπεστάλη. Comp. Rom. vii. 24. This is confirmed by the Syriac and Arab. Versions.

²¹ ὑπὸ τὸν ὄρθρον] 'about day-break.' So Thucyd. has ὑπὸ τὴν ἑω. On ὄρθρον see my note on Luke xxiv. 1, and Thucyd. iii. 12.

— τὴν γερουσίαν] This is supposed to have been added by way of explaining to foreigners the true meaning of τὸ συνέδριον just before; q. d. 'even the whole Senate of Israel.' The word was, however, one so commonly in use with the Greeks, that it could need no such explanation. It should rather seem that τὴν γερουσίαν τῶν υἱῶν Ἰσρ. is added, as being an expression especially applied to the Sanhedrim. It may, however,—Mr. Alf. thinks it does—mean to apply to some who were not members of the Sanhedrim, though venerable for their age and judgment. However, we are here too much in the dark to warrant any positive opinion.

²³ κεκλεισμένον] Not, 'shut,' but 'fastened,' or 'barred.' See note on John xx. 19.

— ἐν πάσῃ ἀσφαλείᾳ] for σὺν πάσῃ ἀσφ., or μετὰ πάσῃ ἀσφαλείᾳ in Cebes. An adverbial phrase for the adverb ἀσφαλίστατως.—Ἐξω, not found in many MSS., Versions, and early Editions (to which I add many Lamb. and Mus. copies), is cancelled by almost every Editor from Weiststein downwards.

²⁴ τί ἂν γένοιτο τ.] I would render, with Grut., Wets., and Valcknaer, 'quid hoc esset rei?' διηπόρουν τί ἂν γέν., being a popular form of expression (importing, 'did not know what to think of the matter') expressive of wonder at some circumstances connected with any thing; as, for instance, the peans, psalms, or songs of it. So x. 17, διηπόρει τί ἂν εἴη τὸ δράμα.

— πεπληρώκ.—τῆς οἰδ.] Comp. Liban. Ep. 721, οὐκ ἀδελου—πάσαι πόλεις ἐπὶ πλησας τῶν ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν λόγων.

— ἐπαγαγεῖν ἐφ' ἡμᾶς, &c.] The phrase ἐπαγαγεῖν τι ἐπὶ τινα signifies, 'to bring any thing (always evil) upon a person;' and is used not only of dangers or punishments, but also criminations brought upon, or against, any one. Thus the sense is, 'to visit upon us,' 'impute to us,' viz. as if we had crucified an innocent person.

29. εἶπον] i. e. through the medium of Peter, as the spokesman; as is suggested by the use of ἀποκριθεῖς, not ἀποκριθέντες. This is, however, a mode of speaking not confined to the Scriptures, but also occurring in the Classical writers. Thus in Thucyd. iii. 52, we have ἐπ' αὐθόρτης ἔλεγον τοιάδ', though the speech was delivered by Astymachus alone. That of Peter here, though without the high finish of Classical composition, is marked by a dense brevity, presenting the true logic of nature, rather than art, and bearing some similarity to one or two of the short speeches in Thucyd.

— πειθαρχεῖν] A stronger term than ἀκούειν, iv. 19, used of implicit obedience to the orders of those who exercise authority of any kind,—parents, rulers, &c. On the sentiment, see note on iv. 19. The reason here implied in the preference, as a paramount duty, of the obedience due, is the same as in a kindred passage of Soph. Antig. 74, 'Ἐπεὶ πλείων χρόνος, "Ὅν δαί μ' ἀρίσκειν τοῖς κάτω (scil. τοῖς θεοῖς) τῶν ἐνωτάδ'· 'Ἐκὶ γὰρ αἰεὶ κείσονται.

30. διεχειρίσασθε] for the Class. διαχρήσασθε. How it came to have this sense, see my Lex.—ξύλον, not a tree, but a post, gibbet, cross, as x. 39. Gal. iii. 13. It is found, however, in some later Greek writers cited in my Lex. The cruel, as well as ignominious manner of death is here adverted to, in order to awaken some compunctious visitation of remorse in the hearers.

31. ἀρχηγὸν καὶ σωτῆρα] These words are put by apposition for ὡς ἀρχ.; for though apposition is generally employed to supply something for the completion of a definition, it often contains, not so much an explanation, or fuller determination of the former, as the design of it. Here, however, when we consider, supra iii. 15, ὃ ἀρχηγὸς τῆς ζωῆς, as said of Jesus, we cannot but regard this as designating the office of him who was constituted King-Messiah, Lord as well as Saviour of the Church (Κύριον καὶ Χριστόν); where there is a sort ofendiadys. Thus the full sense intended is, 'a Prince who shall be Author of salvation, the Lord of life.'

— δοῦναι μετάνοιαν, &c.] i. e. 'to be the means of producing repentance preached (Luke xxiv. 47) by his doctrine, and the Spirit promised, and effecting remission of sins by his all-atoning merits and sacrifice.' (So δοῦναι μετάνοιαν in Joseph.) By conjoining the Holy Ghost as a witness with themselves, they assert the promise in John xv. 26, 27; and there is thus supplied an attestation of the Personality of the Holy Spirit, as well as of the Divinity of Jesus Christ.

32. τῶν ῥημάτων] meaning, 'the things expressed in the words,' especially the death and resurrection of Jesus, and the events which followed.

33. διεπρίοντο] Whichever of the two interpretations propounded by Expositors,—'gnashed their teeth,' or 'were cut to the heart,'—be adopted, there will still be a metaphor of some kind; in the one case, taken from grinding the rows of the teeth one against the other, as one saw against another; in the other, from the drawing of a saw through any substance. Adopting the former, we may render, 'they ground their teeth,' meaning that 'they were filled with rage.' Comp. Lucian de Calum. C. 29, μισεῖ δὲ καὶ τοὺς ὀδόντας διαπρίει, though there the word is used in the active voice, not, as here, the passive. And a middle or deponent form is no where found. Hence it seems best to adopt the other metaphor, and thus we may render, 'were exceedingly vexed.' See Judg. xvi. 16. 2 Kings iv. 27. Ps. vi. 3, and especially Job xix. 2, 'how long will ye vex my soul, and break me in pieces with words?' Accordingly here διεπρίοντο (as in Euseb. H. E. v. l. 6, and διεπρίετο in Ann. Comn. p. 306) might be rendered findabantur. And so findor is used in Pers. Sat. iii. 8. Plaut. Bacch. ii. 3, 17, 'Heu! meum cor finditur,' which exactly corresponds to the more fully worded form of expression infra vii. 54, διεπρίοντο ταῖς καρδίαις αὐτῶν, lit. 'were cut to the heart.' Moreover, the next words there, καὶ ἔβρυχον τοὺς ὀδόντας, seem added by way of depicting, besides the internal feeling of rage, the external expression of this in action.

34. Γαμαλιήλ] A frequent name among the Jews. It is, however, generally agreed that this was the celebrated Gamaliel, son of Simon, and grandson of Hillel, and Paul's master.

— ἐκέλευσεν—ἀποστόλῃ] Ἐκέλευσε may mean, as often in Thucyd., 'counselled, urged.' Ἐξω ποίησαι, 'to put out' (lit. 'to make go forth,' foris), is used according to that idiom by which ποιεῖν is employed with various Adverbs of place, as ἔσω, ἔξω, ἐντός, πέραν, by an ellipse of some verb of motion in the infinitive. Both propriety and custom dictated that, during deliberation upon the guilt or the punishment of a criminal, he should be withdrawn from the presence of his judges. It should seem, however, that their rage made them, on this occasion, forget decorum, till they were reminded of it by Gamaliel, a Pharisee, and (as some suppose) a secret follower of Christ, a man of great prudence and moderation, and who, after the Apostles had departed, took the opportunity of giving counsel to abstain from all violent measures, and to leave the issue of these new doctrines to God.

—βραχύ τι] MSS. A, B, D, E, and about 12 cursives (not one Lamb. or Mus. copy) have not the τι, which has been cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; but wrongly, for external authority is insufficient, inasmuch as the permuti of Tisch. is of very little weight, and arose from the usual hyperbole of Scholz; and internal evidence is in favour of the τι, which was, I suspect, omitted in some MSS., since the expression βραχύ τι, to denote 'a very short space,' though used by the best writers (see Pors. Adv. p. 109), and occurring in Heb. ii. 7 and 9, was not unfrequently cropped down to βραχύ by the scribes, from the τι being (as it continually is) united closely with the βραχύ, and expressed by abbreviation. And, indeed, the variation in the position of the two words in different MSS. might, in some cases, cause the omission. Hence I attribute its omission to the scribes, not to the Critics, whose general custom it was to substitute Class. Greek in the place of ordinary Greek readings, such as βραχύ by itself would be.

36. Θεοδᾶς] This cannot be the Theudas mentioned by Joseph. Antt. xx. 5, 1, as leader of an insurrection, and destroyed, with all his forces, by Fadus the Procurator; for that event took place 14 years after the time of Gamaliel's speech. This difficulty some (as Abp. Usher, Capellus, Bp. Pearce, and Wetstein) attempt to remove, by supposing the Theudas of St. Luke to be the same with the Judas of Josephus, Antt. xvii. 12, 5, who raised an insurrection a little after the time of Herod the First, but was defeated and put to death. And they compare a similar interchange of the names Judas and Thaddæus. This, however, is quite a gratuitous supposition. Hence it is better (with Scaliger, Casaub., Lightf., Grotius, Hamm., Krebs, Whitby, Lardner, and Kuin.) to suppose, on the authority of Origen, contra Cels. i. 6, p. 44, that there were two persons of the name of Theudas; though there may be some doubt as to the period when the insurrection of the first Theudas took place. The second they suppose to have been son or grandson of the first, who again brought together his scattered adherents. Yet, as Dr. Lardner observes, there were several persons of the same name who were leaders of insurrections within no very long time: four Simons within 40 years, and three Judas within ten. And as the references in Wets. show that the name

Theudas was by no means an uncommon one, there is no occasion to suppose the second to have been a son of the first. Indeed, considering the case of the Simons and Judas, may we not suspect that some of the succeeding demagogues took the name of their predecessors, though not related to them? as knowing how prevalent a name, in such cases, always is. From the small number of adherents mentioned (namely 400) it is plain that the insurrection of the first Theudas was not of any great consequence, and therefore was passed over by Josephus. As to Josephus' having, as some say, 'misplaced his Theudas,' it is, Mr. Alford grants, improbable; but he adds, 'not impossible in an historian seeming with inaccuracies' (I give his own Italics). But I would remark, that the charge against the illustrious historian (to whom we Christians are so deeply indebted) is, to the best of my knowledge (after a familiar acquaintance with, and deep critical study of, that writer for upwards of 40 years), a grievously overcharged statement. See my note on Matt. xxiv. 23—25.

—προσεκολλήθη] Whether this or προσεκολληθῇ, found in A, B, C, E, and several cursives (to which, however, I can only add 2 Lamb. and 3 Mus. copies), be the true reading, may be said to be an open question, since internal evidence is divided; though I should now say that it rather inclines in favour of προσεκολληθῇ, from its being a word of later and less pure Grecian, and no where occurring in the early and pure Greek writers. Of those writers who have employed it, some, as Synes. Epist. 150, and Agathar. ap. Athen. p. 528, and Polyb. v. 86, 10, use it in the Active form, but neuter sense; while others use it, as it is done here, as a Middl. Reflex., 'to incline oneself,' 'to be attached to.' So Sext. Empir. p. 434, τῷ ἐνὶ μὲν προσεκολληθῆναι τῶν ἀδίκων. Epiphanius, Panar. p. 728, οἱ μὲν προσεκολληθῆσαν Ἀρτίου, ἱεροὶ δὲ Κολούθου: et al. Clemens, Epist. i. ad Corinth. § 47, προσεκολληθεὶς ἀπὸστόλοις μαρτυρημένοις. Not improbable is it that Epiphanius, and Clemens may have had this passage of St. Luke in mind; and, if they had, its antiquity will go far to show that προσεκολλ. is the true reading, and προσκολλ. only a gloss derived from the scholiasts. Yet, as προσκολλᾶσθαι often occurs both in the Sept. and in the New Test., it was likely to be used by Luke; and προσεκολλ. may have come from the Critics; though from the same cause προσκολλ. may have come from the scholiasts.

37. τῆς ἀπογραφῆς] See note on Luke iii. 1; though the taxing here spoken of is by the best Commentators supposed to be quite distinct from the census there mentioned. So Josephus, Antt. xviii. 1, 1, calls this ἀποτίμησις οὐσίῳ.

— ἀπίστησε] 'drew away into insurrection.' A signification frequent in the Classical writers, from Hdol. downwards; but never, I believe, used by them with ὀπίσω αὐτοῦ after it.

³⁸. ἀπόστητε ἀπὸ τῶν ἀνθρ.] An euphemism, as infra xxii. 29, for 'put them not to death, nor maltreat them.'

— ὅτι ἐὰν ἡ ἐξ ἀνθρώπων, &c.] Hdol. ix. 16, ὅτι δεῖ γενέσθαι ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ, διηχάνον ἀποτρέψαι ἀνθρώπων. Of εἰ δὲ ἐκ Θεοῦ ἐστίν the full sense is, 'But if it be, as it seems, of God.' An idiom also found in the Classical writers.

— μήποτε καὶ θεομάχοι εὐρεθῆτε] These words may connect with ἐάσατε, &c., or there may be an ellipsis of ὁράτε. The full sense is, 'lest we be found to contend with, i. e. to attempt to counteract the purposes of God,' which is confirmed by Luke xxi. 34, and Joseph. Antt. xviii. 6, 6.

⁴¹. χαίροντες] This is to be construed with ὅτι ὑπὲρ, &c. In κατηξιώθησαν ἀτιμασθῆναι Casaubon notices the elegant use of the figure Oryzomora, which arises when two ideas, repugnant to each other, are so joined, as not to be really so, but only to seem so.

⁴². κατ' οἶκον] This, as it is opposed to ἐν

τῷ ἱερῷ, plainly signifies in private houses; κατ' οἶκον being put in a generic sense for κατ' οἴκου, from houses to houses: since κατὰ here exerts a distributive force; though it is not perceptible in Acts xx. 20, δημοσίᾳ καὶ κατ' οἴκου.

VI. 1—7. The appointment of seven persons as deacons, to superintend the distribution of the alms given in the Church.

1. ἐγένετο γογγυσμός] See note on John vii. 12.

— τῶν Ἑλληνιστῶν] On the persons meant by these Hellenists, Expositors are not agreed. Some suppose them to have been Greek Proselytes to Judaism, and now converted to Christianity; others, with more reason, that they were foreign Jews, whose residence was in Grecian cities, and who consequently used ordinarily the Greek language, but were occasionally sojourners in Judæa, including all who, whether on account of origin, or from inhabitation, spoke Greek vernacularly, and used the Sept. Version of the Old Test. rather than the Hebrew text. The Ἑβρ. mentioned just after were those who were Hellenized born, whether resident in Palestine or not, and speaking the Aramean (i. e. Syro-Chaldee), and using the Scripture either in the Hebrew or the Chaldee Paraphrase. Now the pure Jews treated the foreign Jews, and still more proselytes, with nearly equal contempt. Whence, it seems, arose the suspicion on the part of the Hellenists that their widows were neglected. The fault of the neglect in question rested, of course, with the guardians of the poor; who, it is commonly supposed, were persons appointed by the Apostles to attend in rotation, or, as it might otherwise be convenient, to superintend the distribution of the funds for the poor. The best Commentators, however, are of the opinion of Mosheim, that they were certain persons always the same, and all Hebrews, who had hitherto been appointed by the Apostles, but were now to be elected by the people, and that to them seven persons were to be elected by the Hellenists, while others, as Kuin., think that the whole body of the Jerusalemite Christians was divided into seven divisions, for which there were as many places of public worship; and that hence also seven persons were elected for the purpose of taking care of the poor and of strangers, each division choosing one.

— παρεθεωροῦντο] Render: not 'were despised,' as Tyndale and our common Version, but 'were overlooked,' passed by unrelieved. A signification found in Diod. Sic. T. x. 139, ὁ Μ. ὑπὸ τῶν στρατηγῶν παρεθεωρεῖτο· καὶ ἐν προαγωγῇ (promotions) παρεθεωρεῖτο, i. e. was passed by without the reward he was entitled to.

— ἐν τῇ διακονίᾳ] 'in the distribution.'
 2. οὐκ ἀριστὸν ἔστιν ἡμᾶς, &c.] Render: 'it is not meet or fitting;' the ideas of right in the sight of God and essentially right, i. e. proper, being so closely connected as to be convertible terms, so that ἀριστὸν may express the conjoint notion of what is pleasing (by being promotive of human happiness), and what is fit or right in essence. Thus the Heb. טוֹב is, like Gr. ἀριστὸν, capable of expressing both ideas, as in Gen. ii. 18, where we have, 'it is not good (טוֹב) for man to be alone.' The Sept. there has οὐ καλόν, though the sense would have been better expressed by οὐκ ἀριστὸν.

3. ἐπισκεψάσθαι] The word properly signifies 'to look at,' survey; but here, from the adjunct, 'to look at for choice,' 'to look out;' a sense so rare, that only one example has been adduced by Munthe from Diod. Sic. p. 295, ἐπισκεψάμενος τὰς ἀπάντων νομοθεσίας ἐλάξατο τὰ κράτιστα, and, even there, part of the sense has to be supplied by an added term. MS. B has ἐπισκεψάμεθα, a mistake for ὡμεθα, which was, I doubt not, in the original; a daring alteration of some very ancient Critics, similar to one, from an opposite direction, in another passage of this book.

— πλήρεις Πνεύμ. ἁγ.] This expression (unjustifiably lowered by those recent foreign Commentators who explain it merely of a holy ardour) may be supposed to denote the possession both of the gifts of the Holy Ghost, and the graces of the Spirit, so suitable to the situation of the persons in question, and especially what is specified in the next word; for by σοφία seems to be here meant, not so much divine as human wisdom, which was essentially necessary for the proper discharge of the office—namely, sound judgment and prudence. That the persons in question were called to exercise an ecclesiastical, as well as a secular office, is clear, 1. from the expression Πνεύματος ἁγίου; 2. from their being ordained by the laying on of hands, which points at an ecclesiastical, rather than secular office; 3. from the fact that some of those who were appointed, exercised some spiritual functions,—as Stephen.

4. προσκαρτ.] See note on i. 14, and my Lex. in v. By προσευχῇ may be denoted, not only prayer, but 'religious meditation,' as preparatory to the discharge of the ministerial duties in question. See Luke vi. 12.

5. ἐνώπιον—πλήθους] A Hellenistic expression formed on the model of the Hebrew וּפְנֵי. So Deut. i. 23. 2 Sam. iii. 36. A Classical writer would have said ἤρισεν παντὶ τῷ πλῆθει.

— πλήρη πίστεως] This must, as I have shown in Recens. Syn., not be taken with Καὶ, and others, merely in the moral sense of truthfulness, however it may occur elsewhere in the New Test., and seem called for by the accompanying term Πνεύμ. ἁγίου, but in the highest Christian sense, as in the kindred passage, infra xi. 24, of Faith, as used in Rom. v. 1, what is called by Theologians 'a justifying faith,' i. e. a saving grace wrought by the Holy Spirit (conjoined in the above two passages), whereby we receive Christ, as he is revealed to us in the Gospel, fully relying on him and his righteousness alone for justification and salvation.

6. ἐπέθηκαν αὐτοῖς τὰς χεῖρας] Selden and Wolf trace the origin of laying on of hands up to the age of Moses, referring to Numb. xxvii. 18. Whence the custom was handed down in the Jewish Church, and was thence introduced into the Christian. As laying on of hands had always been used in praying for the good of any person present, in order to show, δικαιῶς, for whom the benefit was entreated; so it was also, from the earliest ages, a rite of institution to office, which it conferred by symbol.

7. πολὺν τε ὄχλον τῶν ἱερῶν ὑπ. τ. π.] This statement has to some appeared so improbable, that they have either taken refuge in conjecture, or adopted the reading of a few MSS., ἰουδαίων. But the former course is unauthorized, and the latter founded on a mere error of the scribes, arising from ignorance of an abbrev. : besides, that is so inapposite, that scarcely any authority could justify it. Many eminent Commentators take ὄχλος to mean the multitude of the inferior priests, as opposed to the leaders of the 24 classes. But that would require the Article, and then only increase the difficulty; which may best be removed by taking πολὺν ὄχλος in a restricted and popular sense, of a considerable number. This is confirmed by Chrysostom, who interprets it by πολλοί. That a comparatively considerable number of the whole (which amounted to about 5000) should have become believers, is not strange, considering the miracles they had witnessed, both from Jesus and from the Apostles. The expression ἐπ' ἡ. τ. π. is remarkable, and occurs no where else. It denotes the complete subjection of the mind as to the credenda of religion.

8. πίστεως] I am now inclined to think that χάριτος, adopted by almost all the Critical Editors on strong authority (to which, however, I cannot add any except Trin. Coll. B. x. 16), is the true reading, and the text. rec. an alteration suggested by v. 5.

9. Διβερτίνων] It is a matter exceedingly debated, as to who were these Libertines. The most general opinion is, either that they were manumitted slaves of Gentile origin, but who had become proselytes to the Jewish religion, and had a synagogue at Jerusalem; or, that they were Jews by birth, but had been taken captive by the Romans, when Pompey conquered Judaea, but were afterwards manumitted, and, in remembrance of their captivity, called themselves Libertini, and formed a synagogue by themselves at Rome. Of these two opinions the latter is greatly preferable. But, as all the following denominations of persons (the Cyrenians, Alexandrians, &c.) are so called from names of places, so there is reason to suppose this the case in the present instance; especially as the Glossa Interlinearis has over the word Libertini the remark ἐξ regione, intimating that they were so called from a country. And Suidas, doubtless with reference to this passage, says Διβερτίνων ὄνομα ἔθους. Moreover, the Pesh. Syr. Version has ܐܠܝܒܝܪܬܝܢܐ, 'those of Libertina.' Accordingly, Bp. Pearce and others suppose that by the Libertines are meant Jews of Libertina, a town in Proconsular Africa, near Carthage. This, however, was a place so obscure, that it is difficult to prove its existence at all, and certainly not at this early period. Nay, supposing that it did exist, it would be little likely to have been classed with Cyrene and Alexandria, as having had a synagogue. There is more reason to think, with Beza, Spanheim, Le Clerc, Reland, and Valcknaer, that some corruption in spelling has here crept in, and that the true orthography is (as Gothofred conjectured) Διβερτίνων, meaning (as we can prove from Steph. Byz.) the inhabitants of Libya proper, a territory adjoining to Cyrenaica, and situated between that and the Alexandrina, or territory of Alexandria. It should seem, then, that the Synagogue in question was appropriated to the reception of Jewish sojourners from Libya proper; and was erected by the Jews of that country for the use of their brethren when residing at Jerusalem. Perhaps, however, the Cyrenians and Alexandrians are meant to be included as joining at the Synagogue in question.

I will only add, that though no authority exists for the above reading in the MSS. extant, yet it was certainly found in those from which the Armenian Version was formed. However, as the above view requires too much to be taken for granted, I must formally acquiesce in the second mentioned above, that the persons were, as Chrys. says, οἱ Παλαιὸν ἀναλεύθεροι. Dr. Wieseler, in his Chronology of the Acts of the Apostles, pp. 60—63, shows from two passages of Tacitus and Philo, that great numbers of Jews of the Provinces had been made slaves during the Civil Wars, and were afterwards manumitted; nay, he shows the high probability that St. Paul himself was a Cilician Libertinus. That a slave manumitted with due formalities became a Roman citizen, and transmitted it to his offspring, is well known. And thus the Apostle, with not a few other Cilician Jews, may have been, like Horace, Libertino patre natus. See more in Conybeare's note in his Life and Epistles of St. Paul, p. 82, where he goes far to show that the present verse, which describes Stephen's great opponents (with whom Paul then agreed), may be so translated as to mean 'Libertines from Cyrene, Alexandria, Cilicia, and Asia.'

10. τῇ σοφίᾳ καὶ τῷ πνεύματι, &c.] It is surely an unjustifiable lowering of the sense to explain this merely, as it has been done by many recent, and espec. the German Commentators, 'ardour and energy.' From the evident allusion here existing to what was said at ver. 3, that the Deacons were to be πλήρεις Πνεύματος ἁγίου καὶ σοφίας, and to what is ascribed to Stephen, vv. 3 and 5, that he was πλήρης χάριτος καὶ πνεύματος ἁγίου, it will, I think, plainly appear that by πνεῦμα is here meant 'the influence of the Holy Spirit;' which will, of course, determine the sense of σοφία to be Divine wisdom. We have here, indeed, a kind of Hendiadys, which Calvin seems to have recognized, by explaining, 'Non poterant resistere sapientiæ quam Spiritus Dei suggererat.' Nay, it may be added, even Grotius acknowledges this to imply the Divine power directing his words, agreeably to the promise of Christ, Luke xxi. 15, 'I will give you a mouth and wisdom (στόμα καὶ σοφίαν) which all your adversaries shall not be able to gainsay nor resist; for (as it is said, Matt. x. 20) 'it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you.'

¹¹. ὑπέβαλον] 'suborned.' How it comes to mean this, see my Lex.

— λαλοῦντος ῥήμ. βλάβσημα εἰς Μωϋσὴν καὶ τὸν Θεόν] It is said 'against Moses and God,' because, under the old Jewish theocracy, to speak evil of the founder of their religion was considered tantamount to blasphemy against God himself, by whose command the Law had been promulgated by Moses; and, indeed, as combining the crimes of treason and blasphemy, was always punished with death. See Joseph. Bell. ii. 8. 9.

¹². ἐπιστάντες] 'came upon and seized him.' See note on iv. 1. This must be referred to the people, elders, and scribes, not to the suborners; the subject being here changed, as often in Scripture and the best Classical writers.

¹⁵. εἶδον—ἀγγέλου] Some Commentators, especially the older, think that Stephen's face was made to shine supernaturally, by a visible glory like that of Moses (Exod. xxxiv. 29). But others, and the more recent generally, are agreed in interpreting this as a popular form of expression, indicating majesty and divine grace, such as might inspire reverence and awe. And they appeal to Eccl. v. 2. 2 Sam. xiv. 17. xix. 27. Gen. xxxiii. 10. Certainly there is nothing here said to lead us to suppose that this was a supernatural glory like that of Moses. Nevertheless, there is something in the whole air of the passage that suggests the idea of the supernatural of some kind in the glorifying Stephen's face, whereby it beamed forth a divine radiance.

VII. In this Apologetical Speech of St. Stephen

there is much which to us appears obscure, though, doubtless, sufficiently intelligible to those to whom it was addressed. Various hypotheses have, indeed, been hazarded, to remove, or at least lessen, the difficulty; which, however, after all, may be more apparent than real. And if we take into consideration the scope of the address, the character of the composition, and the circumstances under which it was delivered, it will not seem surprising that there should be found a few things which may seem abrupt, and not quite apposite. To advert to the scope:—This appears to have been, 'to practically refute the charge made against him of contempt of their Lawgiver and the Temple, and to retort on his accusers the charge they were bringing forward against himself,—namely, of endeavouring to destroy the Jewish religion.' The speaker intended to show, by a brief review of the history of the Jews, and a detail of their various rebellions against God, that it was themselves rather who were guilty of contempt of their Law; and by their own perverse disobedience had been the real occasion of the destruction of the first temple, as they might be of the second. In order to establish his position, he first reviews the early history of their nation, and points out various instances of their disobedience to God: showing, moreover, that, though the rites of the Mosaic Law were appointed by the command of God himself, yet that the Israelites were not approved unto God solely by those observances. That their temple might be destroyed, and yet the true worship of God be carried on acceptably to him; nay, that it even would be destroyed, unless they should repent.

To advert to the other particulars:—First, as to the character of the composition; though generally apologetic, it is occasionally polemic; and if we consider the peculiar circumstances under which the address was delivered, we shall be at no loss to account for an occasional abruptness and want of coherence in the reasoning. As to the alleged in-appositeness of some arguments and illustrations, it must be observed, that they were sufficiently apposite for the persons addressed, and quite accordant with the Jewish manner; the whole character of the composition being Jewish. Further, as to the inconclusiveness of the course of argumentation objected to by some, it must be δὲ ἔφη· Ἄνδρες ἀδελφοὶ καὶ πατέρες, ἀκούσατε. ² Ὁ Θεὸς τῆς δόξης ὤφθη τῷ πατρὶ ἡμῶν Ἀβραάμ, ὄντι ἐν τῇ Μεσοποταμίᾳ, πρὶν ἢ κατοικῆσαι αὐτὸν ἐν Χαρρᾶν, ³ καὶ εἶπε πρὸς αὐτόν· ^a Gen. 12. 1. remembered that the course of argumentation was interrupted and broken off in the middle by the infuriate multitude. Had it been brought to a conclusion, there would, we may be sure, have been nothing left incomplete, as to that which was intended to be proved. The remainder of the address would doubtless have been occupied in applying the foregoing narration in order to prove fully whatever was meant to be evinced. It was, we may suppose, the purpose of the speaker to convict his hearers of the guilt which they imputed to him, and to show that the true and acceptable worship of God was not to be confined to any particular place; since God dwells not in temples made with hands (ver. 48); nay, the worship of the Patriarchs, even before the Temple was erected, was accepted by him. See v. 2.

Before concluding the present sketch, it may be proper to advert to a charge somewhat more difficult to answer,—namely, that, in detailing various particulars of the Jewish history, Stephen has here added some circumstances which seem contradictory to the accounts in the Old Test. These will be briefly considered in the notes on the passages themselves; in which it will be shown, 1. that the discrepancies in question have been greatly exaggerated; 2ndly, that they are, in general, far from being irreconcilable; and, 3rdly, that if, in one or two instances, they should seem really such, yet if we consider that the speaker is arguing with the people, according to Jewish ideas, and on Jewish principles, and alleging facts which they themselves recognized, there is nothing which can reasonably impeach the veracity, or cast a slur on the inspiration, of this great Protomartyr; for in those few particulars it is admitted that he spoke on the authority of those Rabbinical traditions whose authority his hearers regarded as unquestionable.

1. εἰ-ούτως ἔχει·] On the nature of this idiom, see note supra i. 6.

— ἄνδρες—πατέρες] By ἄνδρες ἀδελφοὶ are meant the multitude in general; and by πατέρες, the members of the Sanhedrim.

2. ὁ Θεὸς τῆς δόξης] This is not put simply, as Expositors generally suppose, by Hebraism, for 'the glorious God,' but, as Calvin remarks, 'Ideo Deum gloria appellat (Steph.) ut a falsis et ficticiis deis eum discernat qui solus gloria dignus.' Compare ὁ βασιλεὺς τῆς δόξης, as applied to Jehovah in Ps. xxiv. 7, 10.

— πρὶν ἢ κατ., &c.] To remove a seeming discrepancy between what is here said and the account of Moses, the best Commentators are agreed that Stephen here followed the Jewish tradition, adopted by Philo, but not mentioned in Genesis,—that God appeared twice to Abraham,—1st, when living in Chaldea, and 2ndly, when resident at Charran. The statement of Stephen (says a writer in the Quarterly Review for 1834, ubi supra) strictly harmonizes with the prevailing notions of the time; and, indeed, with no great difficulty, may be brought into accordance with the Scriptures, and this without removing Haran beyond the boundaries of Mesopotamia; though, in fact, the situation of Haran is a question of very slight importance. The Jews supposed the first call of Abraham to have taken place, not in Haran, but in Ur, of the Chaldees. They rested that belief on Gen. xv. 7. So in Neh. ix. 7; and though the general course of the narrative in Genesis would lead to the opinion, that no call took place till after the first migration to Charran and the death of Terah, yet the description of the call begins, in our version, with the words, "Now, the Lord had said unto Abraham," leaving the date of the transaction indefinite; and Rosenmüller observes on the Hebrew word: "Dixitque, vel potius, 'dixerat autem,' nempe quum esset in Chaldea, priusquam Carras venisset." That this was the established opinion we have the authority of Philo de Abrahamo, vol. ii. p. 11, and of Josephus, Antt. i. 7, 1. But the most remarkable evidence that the Jews of the later times, at least, drew a distinction between the land of the Chaldeans and Mesopotamia, though the former must have been comprehended within the latter, is to be found in the book of Judith.

4. κάκειθεν—μετόπισεν] Again there is a trifling discrepancy between this account and that in Genesis; the best solution of which seems to be that which proceeds on the supposition that here Stephen followed the tradition of the Jews, founded on Gen. xv. 7, and Nehem. ix. 7, and adopted by Philo, that Abraham was twice called.

5. οὐκ ἔδωκεν] The best Commentators are agreed that ἔδωκεν is to be taken in a pluperfect sense, and that the οὐ is for οὐπω. Οὐδὲ βῆμα ποδός is a proverbial expression, corresponding to our idiom, 'not even a foot of land,' for 'none at all;' suggested by Deut. ii. 5, οὐ γὰρ δὴ ὑμῖν οὐδὲ βῆμα ποδός, and comp. Joseph. Antt. v. 3, 1, οὐδὲ ὀλίγον αὐτοῖς ἐπιβαστὸν τοῦ παδίου καταλιπόντες.—Εἰς κατάσχεσιν. Supply αὐτῇ, for ὥστε κατέσχεν αὐτῇν, 'to occupy,' i. e. possess it. So Joseph. Antt. ix. 1, 2, οἱ τὴν ὑπ' αὐτοῦ δοθεισάν γῆν εἰς κατάσχεσιν ἀφελίσθαι παρίσιν αὐτοῦς. As Abraham himself did not possess the country, we may suppose the promise figuratively fulfilled in him through his posterity; or rather the καὶ may be regarded (with the best recent Commentators) as explicative, for nempe, scilicet.

The sense, then, may be thus expressed: 'and yet had not given him any possession in this land, not a foot of it, and yet he promised the possession of it to him,—namely, to his posterity, although he had as yet no offspring.'

6, 7. The passage is from Gen. xv. 13, 14, and is cited from memory. Accordingly, there are several variations from the Sept., all of them, however, unimportant, except that, 1. we have added in the Sept. καὶ κατακλινοῦσιν αὐτοὺς after κακ. Yet the words are not in the Hebrew, and seem to have come from the margin as a gloss, probably from Judith v. 11, or perhaps they were a different version of נָחַם. However, these verbs, while they have a common subject in γῇ, may yet be supposed to have a twofold reference,—the former, to the Egyptians, the latter, to the inhabitants of the countries wherein the Israelites sojourned in affliction from the time they left Egypt to the time they were settled in Canaan. Thus we may explain the sense to be: 'And they (i. e. the Egyptians) shall enslave them, and they (i. e. the Edomites, Canaanites, &c.) shall afflict them.'

The words εἶπεν ὁ Θεός are found neither in the Hebrew nor LXX. But they form no part of the quotation, being a parenthetical remark, such as we often find interposed in citations from the Old Test. Again the words αὐτὸ μετὰ ἀποσκευῆς πολλῆς are found in both the Hebrew and the LXX., but not in the New Test. Yet this is no real discrepancy; because Stephen evidently did not mean to adduce those words, but stops at ἐξελεύσονται. There is, indeed, a seeming discrepancy in the words καὶ λατρεύσουσί μοι ἐν τῷ τόπῳ τούτῳ, which are neither in the Hebrew nor the Sept. But though these are not there, something very similar occurs at v. 16; and Stephen does not adduce the words as immediately following the preceding. Surenheus., too, has proved that it was a custom with the Jewish doctors (and hence was sometimes adopted by the writers of the New Test.), when they cited any passages of the Old Test., to occasionally add words elsewhere employed on the same subject, and now and then with a slight variation of them for adaptation. And, besides that the words are found in substance at v. 16, they seem to have been suggested by a kindred passage at Exod. iii. 12, ἐν τῷ ἐξαγαγεῖν σε τὸν λαόν μου ἐξ Αἰγύπτου, καὶ λατρεύσει τῷ Θεῷ ἐν τῷ ὄρει τούτῳ. Thus there is, on the principles of Jewish writing, no actual discrepancy.

6. τετρακόσια] The Chronological difficulty here involved is not so much in the thirty years' difference between this estimate and that of Josephus (because τετρακ. may be taken as a round number; and even Josephus himself sometimes makes it 400), as how to reconcile this with the fact that the Israelites were in Egypt at the most but 243 years. Nor can this difficulty be removed by the parenthesis which Markland would introduce; nay, the construction of the Hebrew will not permit it. The difficulty may best be obviated by bearing in mind that the subject of the verbs נָחַם and נָחַם, and also of δουλώσουσι καὶ κακώσουσι, is to be sought in the nouns γῆ and γῆ respectively; and thus it will be 'the inhabitants of that land.' And if the truth of chronology limits the abode of the Israelites in Egypt to 243 years, and assigns 400 as the time which elapsed between Abraham's leaving Chaldea and the period when they were established in Canaan, I see not how we can suppose otherwise than that the verbs above-mentioned, though having a common subject in γῇ, yet have a twofold reference,—in the former verb to the Egyptians, in the latter to the inhabitants of the countries wherein they sojourned in affliction from the time they left, to the time they were settled in Canaan. Thus we may render, 'And they (i. e. the Egyptians) shall enslave them, and they (i. e. the Edomites, Canaanites, &c.) shall afflict them.' It is true that most Commentators, with our common Version, take נָחַם as a verb semiter; a view also maintained by Rosenm. Yet he is obliged to suppose (what involves great harshness) the suffix ׁ as put for the separate form ׁ. But that is surely counting a difficulty; since the verb may be taken in an active sense, as it was by the LXX., and is done by Montanus, and by Gesenius, who in his Lex. gives several examples, and resolves the suffix ׁ into ׁ; though ellipsis, rather than resolution, seems to be the principle here to be resorted to.

8. διαθήκην περιτομῆς] Meaning, 'the covenant sealed by circumcision,' as its distinguishing mark, it being at its institution (Gen. xxii. 10) called a διαθήκη.

— καὶ οὕτως· 'and so,' i. e. in virtue of that covenant.—πατριάρχας, so called as being the primogenitors and heads of the πατρίαι, or tribes.

9. ἀπέδοντο εἰς Αἴγ.] A peculiar construction, but occurring Hdol. ii. 56, τὴν μὲν αὐτίαν εἰς Λιβύην, τὴν δὲ εἰς τὴν Ἑλλάδα ἀπέδοντο, and other passages, which see in my Lex. The rationale of the construction is, that in ἀποδ. there is a sensus praeparatus, including the object of action. In ζηλώσαντες (used with allusion to Gen. xxxvii. 11), the speaker seems to hint at his own case; for Joseph, though peculiarly favoured by God, was yet hated by his brethren.

10. ἔδωκεν αὐτῷ χάριν καὶ σοφίαν.] Ἐναντίον may be taken as belonging to both χάριν and σοφίαν, with adaptation to each; q. d. 'gave him favour in the sight of Pharaoh, and wisdom in his sight,' i. e. so as to be esteemed by him for his wisdom.

11. Χαναάν] from the Heb. חנאן, lit. the low-land district of Palestine, in contrast to the high-land one of Libanus, &c.

— χορτάσματα] The word is properly used of food for cattle; and (like χορτάζω in the New Test. and the later Greek writers) is very rarely applied to food for men; and then only to the coarser sorts, and such as are used from necessity.

13. ἀνεγνωρίσθη] 'made himself known.' This use of the Passive (like the Hebrew conjugation Hithpael) answers to the reflected verbs of the modern languages.

14. ἐν ψυχαῖς ἐβδ.] Here there is no occasion to suppose the ellipsis of συνισταμένην; nor, indeed, any other. For in the passage of Deut. x. 22, on which the present is formed, the ἐν stands for σύν, and β has the sense of with, accompanied by. So Numb. xx. 20, כָּל בְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל בְּעֵינָיו. The best mode of removing the seeming discrepancy in the number is that of Hammond, Wetstein, and others, who think that the LXX. numbered among the posterity of Jacob the five sons of Manasseh and Ephraim born in Egypt; and that these were omitted by Moses, because they were born after Jacob's departure, but by the LXX. at Gen. xlii. 20, are expressly added from 1 Chron. vii. 14. For δ I have now received φ, with all the recent Editors, because internal evidence, coming in aid of external (which is somewhat weak, and I can add nothing), is quite in its favour.

To advert to the discrepancy between the present account and that in Gen. xlix. 30, the best Critics are of opinion that Ἀβραὰμ is spurious, and that μετετέθησαν and ἐτίθησαν are to be referred to the words οἱ πατέρες ἡμῶν only, not to Ἰακώβ also; and that at ὠνήσατο we must supply, from the preceding, Ἰακώβ. The reading of some very ancient MSS., ὁ πατήρ ἡμῶν, attests that, at an early period, Ἀβραὰμ was not here, and that something was thought to be wanting; which was, it seems, supplied in two ways. To understand Ἰακώβ from the preceding, is not near so harsh as in many subauditions that might be adduced from Thucydides. And indeed there is the less harshness here, since Jacob is the chief subject of these two sentences; the other is only incidental.

17. καθὼς ἤγγ.] Render: 'Now as,' equiv. to when as, i. e. at the time when the promise (viz. its fulfilment) was drawing nigh. See note on 1 Cor. i. 6.

18. οὐκ ᾔδει τὸν Ἰ.] 'had no respect for Joseph, or his memory;' as 1 Thess. iv. 4. v. 12.

19. κατασφισάμενος τὸ γένος ἡμῶν] Meaning, 'plotting our destruction by crafty devices,' such as overworking and underfeeding them. This sentiment (founded on Exod. i. 10, Sept.) is further evolved in a similar passage of Judith, v. 11, καὶ ἐπανάστη αὐτοῖς ὁ βασιλεὺς Αἰγύπτου, καὶ κατασφισάντο αὐτοὺς ἐν πόνῳ καὶ ἐν πλίνθῳ, καὶ ἐπατίευσαν αὐτοὺς, καὶ ἔθιντο αὐτοὺς εἰς δούλους. tion of the crafty policy of Pharaoh just spoken of; which was to reduce the Israelites to a state of such extreme misery, that they might be driven to the atrocity in question, and the population, at any rate, be kept down, even by infanticide.—Ποιεῖν ἔκθετα is for ἐκτιθέναι, a term expressly applied to the abandonment of infants. For τοῦ ποιεῖν is, as I have shown, to be understood of the Israelites, οὗτοὺς being supplied, which may be better fetched from the pl. αὐτῶν than from the sing. αὐτόν. That the Israelites did expose their children is certain, from Exod. ii. and Jos. Antt. ii. 9, 4. Thus in τοῦ ποιεῖν we have a genit. of purpose, the expression being equiv. to ἵνα ποιῶσι. The words following εἰς τὸ μὴ ζωογονεῖσθαι cannot mean, as many eminent Expositors explain, 'that they might not multiply and increase' (as referred to Pharaoh's purpose);—a sense deficient in proof—but must signify, 'that they might not be preserved alive,' namely, to experience the miserable fate of their parents. On the same principle as that on which the North American Indian women often destroy their female children.

²¹ ἐκτιθέντα δὲ αὐτόν] These words are commonly regarded as Accusatives absolute; though recent Commentators prefer supposing a pleonasm of αὐτόν; which, however, within so short a distance, can hardly be admitted. Perhaps it may better be referred to the rule of Matthies, Gr. Gr. § 426, 3, by which, to a substantive expressing the leading idea of a proposition, and put at its beginning, is supplied quod attinet ad. Ἀνείλεσθαι properly signifies to take up, and is often used of raising up drowning men from the sea, or taking up corpses for burial; but sometimes, as here, of taking up and taking care of exposed children. So Aristoph. Nub. 531, κἀγὼ Ἐξίθηκα, καί τ' ἐτίρα τις λαβοῦσα ἀνείλετο.

from Philo, in his life of Moses), in a knowledge of astronomy and astrology, the interpretation of dreams, magic, mathematics, medicine, &c. Indeed, all the greatest writers of antiquity agree in calling Egypt the mother of arts and sciences. See Joseph. Antt. viii. 2, 5, who says their wisdom exceeded that of all other nations, even to a proverb. Among these, Bp. Warburton reckons Civil Polity and Legislation; and whatever has been said is much confirmed by the interesting and important matter contained in the recently published noble work of Sir G. Wilkinson. That Moses was instructed in whatever was known in Egypt, we cannot doubt; and his surprising aptitude at learning whatever he was taught is attested by Josephus, on the authority of ancient tradition.

—δυνατός—ἔργους] This may seem inconsistent with the impediment which Moses is known to have had in his speech. Inasmuch that at Exod. iv. 16, we find Aaron his spokesman to the people. But δυνατός and ἐν λόγοις may denote persuasive, and therefore powerful, though not eloquent, oratory. And that Moses had this faculty, we learn from Joseph. Antt. iii. 1, 4. Considering, too, what he relates, Ant. ii. 5, that Moses had the command of an expedition against the Egyptians, we may not improbably suppose what is here said of Moses to be nearly equivalent to what Thucydides, i. 139, says of Themistocles, that he was λίγυις τε καὶ πρᾶσσιμ δυνατάτατος, i. e. both a powerful orator and able statesman.

time of their deliverance drew near. Hence from the proof given by Moses of his readiness to venture his very life to serve them, they might have concluded that he was appointed of God to be the means of their deliverance. And Moses might justly suppose that they would so conclude.

26. συνήλασεν] lit. 'he set, endeavoured to set them at one, unite and reconcile them.' How the word comes to signify this see my Lex.

27. τίς σε κατέστησεν—ἡμᾶς] This has the air of a proverbial expression, and may be compared with similar expressions in Gen. xix. 9, and Luke xii. 14. So also Joseph. Bell. i. 23, 5, Κύριον ἑμὶ, καὶ δικαστὴν κατέστησεν. Both there and here δικαστὴς means, not judge, but emperor; as in Thucyd. iv. 83, δικαστὴν ἔφη Βρασιδαν τῶν σφετέρων διαφορῶν ἀγαγεῖν.

30. Σινᾶ] In the Mosaic account it is Horeb. But it appears from Burckhardt and Laborde, that the mountain had, like Parnassus, a double summit, forming two peaks, one Horeb, the other Sinai.

— ἐν φλογὶ πυρὸς βάτου] lit. 'in a flame of a bush of fire,' i. e. on fire; the Genit. πυρὸς being for an adjective.

In vain is it that certain foreign Commentators, presumptuously speculating on the nature of this circumstance, seek to lower it to the level of a natural phenomenon, and to account for it on merely natural principles. The preternatural here displays itself in characters too plain to be overlooked; inasmuch that none but those who deny it elsewhere can fail to recognize it here. Well, indeed, were it if such as think themselves too wise 'to believe all that the prophets have spoken,' would here learn a lesson from those heathen sages, the theme of their too indiscriminate admiration. Wise is the saying of Pindar, Pyth. x. 76, ἴμολ δὲ, θαυμάσια (for such ought undoubtedly to be read, instead of θαυμάσαι) θαῶν τελεσάντων, οὐδὲν ποτε φαίνεται ἱμῶν ἀπιστον.

31. κατανοῆσαι] Κατανοῶ properly signifies 'to master any thing in thought,' so as to understand it; but here, by a usual interchange of the notions of internal and external sense, 'to behold,' 'to examine,' in order to comprehend its nature.

32. Ἐντρομος γινόμενος, &c.] 'It might,' says Calvin, 'seem strange that words so full of consolation should thus produce fear, rather than comfort and encouragement. But it was good for Moses here to fear at the presence of God, that he might thus be impressed with a deeper feeling of reverence.'

34. κάκωσιν] A rare word, of which Weta. adduces only one example,—from Plut. Yet I have noted it also in Thucyd. vii. 4, and 82. ii. 43.

35. This rejection of Moses' claims is introduced to remind them of what they had been all along doing, by that stiff-necked obstinacy, characteristic of their nation; and is espec. intended to bear upon the case of their rejection of Jesus Christ.

36. ἐν Ἐρυθρᾷ θαλάσῃ] Said to be so called from the 'red tinge,' imparted by the weeds with which it abounds,—inasmuch that it is called in Genesis 1. 11, 'the weedy sea.' And such is the name given it by the Pesch. Syr. Translator. Rosenm., however, is of opinion that it ought to be called the sea of Madrepores, from the submarine substances so called which occupy the bottom. A view also adopted by Laborde, Travels in Petrea, p. 264, who quotes Giovanni Finati, as saying, that the water is so transparent, that he amused himself in observing the peculiarity of the depths below him, where weeds and corals grow to such a size, as almost to have the appearance of groves and gardens. But as the Madrepores and corals are of a red colour, the former view is rather confirmed, than otherwise.

37. ὡς ἐμέ] Supply ἀνέστησε, taken from ἀναστήσει preceding. See iii. 22, and note. The words ὡς ἐμέ intimate that Christ is the end of the Law. Rom. x. 4.

38. ὁ γενόμενος—μετὰ τοῦ ἀγγέλου] 'who communicated with the angel'; namely, by acting as mediating interpreter between God and the ἐκκλησία, i. e. the assembly of Israelites congregated on Mount Sinai at the promulgation of the Law. The construction is γενέσθαι μετὰ τοῦ ἀγγέλου καὶ (μετὰ) τῶν πατέρων ἡμῶν. On ἀγγελος, denoting 'the Angel-Jehovah,' see note on v. 53.

—λόγια ζῶντα] Λόγιον is a term properly used of 'the Scriptures of the Old Testament.' Its primary signification being something uttered, it came to be confined to 'oracular responses' (as Hdot. iv. 178. Thucyd. ii. 8), and was therefore well adapted to denote any revelation of God to man. Hence Procopius, p. 157, 17, applies it to the Scriptures of the New Testament. Ζῶντα may be taken for ζωοποιούντα, as John vi. 51, and Heb. x. 20, 'soul-saving.' So in Deut. xxxii. 47, the Law is said to be ζῶν. Thus the general sense is: 'For even this Moses, who acted as the mediator between the Angel-Jehovah and the congregation of the people, and who received these weighty revelations of Divine will at the hand of God, even he could not secure their obedience to his authority. On the contrary, they rejected that authority, desired to return into Egypt, and seduced Aaron to make the golden calf, trampling on the authority both of Moses and God.' See note supra v. 35.

39. Ἰστροφῆσαν ταῖς καρδίαις αὐτῶν] Here the MSS. vary, and Editors differ. Lachm. reads ἐν ταῖς καρδ., from three of the most ancient MSS. and two others. Tisch. and Alf. τῇ καρδίᾳ, from upwards of fifty MSS.; to which I can add 4 Lambeth, and 3 Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B. x. 16; while Griesb. and Scholz retain the text. rec., perhaps rightly; for no sufficient reason can be urged for any change, since the text. rec. is supported by the great body of the MSS., confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions. Though Versions are, in a case like this, not a very weighty authority. Whether τῇ καρδίᾳ or ταῖς καρδίαις be the true reading, is, indeed, an open question, and the more difficult to determine, since the phrase στρέφειν, &c., occurs, as far as I know, nowhere else either in the New Test., the Sept., or the Class. writers; and especially considering that the singular and the plural forms are elsewhere found to vary, e. g. infra v. 51, ἀπερίτμητοι τῇ καρδίᾳ, where the MSS. offer καρδίαις and ταῖς κ., the former of which is adopted by Lachm.; while Tisch. retains the text. rec.; very properly, since the weight of authority is in its favour, confirmed by such expressions as οἱ καθαροὶ τῇ καρδίᾳ, οἱ πατινοὶ τῇ καρδίᾳ, &c. The full sense seems to be, 'they turned back (reverted in heart and affection) to Egyptian idolatry and immorality.'

—Ἰστροφῆσαν—Αἰγυπτῶν] This is by some Commentators taken to mean, 'they were bent on returning.' (See Exod. xvi. 3. xvii. 3.) By others, 'their affections reverted back to Egypt, its sensuality and idolatry.' See Ezek. xx. 8. The two senses may be included.

40. οἱ προπορεύ. ἡμῶν] It was customary among the Oriental nations of antiquity for the images of the gods to be borne before the people in journeys, or military expeditions, since they fancied they thus enjoyed their more effectual protection. Indeed the true God had done this in the pillar of the cloud and fire. See Numb. x. 53, comp. with Deut. xxxiv. 8. Accordingly, the people demanded that the gods, or images of the gods, whom they had made the objects of their worship, should be borne before them.

41. ἐμοσχοποίησαν] The people had seen in Egypt divinities worshipped under certain visible forms; and they were now led to choose that of a golden calf, or bullock, for a symbol of the true God, because the Egyptians worshipped Osiris, the inventor, or introducer, of agriculture, &c. under the form of a bull (Apis), as the symbol of agricultural labour. See Hdot. iii. 28. Diod. Sic. i. 21; though the ox was a common form for idols in the East, especially in Chaldea and Assyria; and colossal bulls have recently been disinterred by Dr. Layard. Sir G. Wilkinson, however, is of opinion, that these golden calves were imitations of Mævis, a bull kept at Heliopolis, as a living symbol of the Sun; which is confirmed by the words of the next verse, λατρεύον τῇ στρατ. τ. οὐρανοῦ.

⁴² Ἔστρεψε—καὶ παρίδ.] 'turned (about), and delivered them to serve,' &c.; meaning, 'that he changed from his former gracious kindness towards them, and, provoked by their rebellion, delivered them up to their own idolatrous desires.' We must understand this as a judicial infliction, not a mere letting them follow the corrupt affections of their own heart; just as in the similar case mentioned by St. Paul, Rom. i. 28, καθὼς ὅτι ἰδοκίμασαν τὸν Θεὸν ἔχον ἐν ἱπικυνώσῃ, παρίδωκεν αὐτοὺς ὁ Θεὸς εἰς ἀδοκίμον νοῦν. Thus, in either case, God delivered them up to, by withdrawing his preventing grace to restrain them from, the corruptions of their own minds and hearts. See the able note of Calvin, who remarks that by this example we are admonished, 'ut solliciti ad sequendum Dei regulam intenti simus; quia simul atque vel tantillum ab ea defleximus, huc et illuc variis deliriis raptari, impleari plurimis superstitionibus, ac penitus demergi in vastam errorum colluviem, necesse est. . . . Hinc simul colligere licet, non aliter posse nos rectam viam persequi, nisi quum Dominus nobis regendus innuunt; aversa autem ejus facie, nos statim in errores abstrahi.'

—λατρ. τῇ στρατ. τ. οὐρ.] i. e. 'the host of the firmament'—the sun, moon, and stars, or planets. The expression is derived from the Hebr. צְוָנוֹת מַיִם. The fact is not recorded in the Pentateuch as occurring at this time; but traces of it in after times occur in several passages of 2 Kings; and occasionally in the Prophets, as Jer xix. 13. Zeph. i. 5. In the subjoined quotation, alleged in proof, by βιβλ. τ. προφ. is meant 'the Body of the Prophets' (i. e. the minor, or shorter Prophets), regarded as a Volume. The passage cited is from Amos v. 25, 26, in the Sept., with scarcely any variation, except that οἶκος Ἰσραὴλ is transposed.

—μὴ σφάγια, &c.] An interrogative sentence uttered in by μὴ (answering to the Hebr. מִן) has generally the force of a negation. But as it appears from Scripture that the Israelites did offer sacrifices to God in the desert, it should seem that the idiom has here the force of assertion: 'Did ye indeed offer to me sacrifices for forty years in the wilderness? [yes;] and yet [καὶ for καίτοι] [so little was your piety], that [in conjunction with my worship] ye raised the tabernacle of Moloch.' This mode of solution, and the interpretation connected with it, are confirmed by the Expositors on the Hebrew original, especially Dr. Henderson, who annotates as follows:—'The true construction of the passage is founded on the principle, that not unfrequently in Hebrew the interrogation implies, and calls for, an emphatic affirmative, either expressed or understood; and is thus equivalent to a negative interrogation in our language. See 1 Sam. ii. 27, 28. Job xx. 4. Jer. xxxi. 20. Ezek. xx. 4. In the present case, as in those cited, the persons addressed are supposed to admit the fact couched in the appeal.' The use of the Hebr. ו for 'and yet,' and of the Greek καὶ for καίτοι, are each of frequent occurrence.

—τὸ ἄστρον τοῦ Θεοῦ ὑμῶν] i. e. the image of him whom ye account as a god, and worship under the image of a star.

—Ῥεμφάν] Of the various hypotheses formed by the learned to reconcile the apparent discrepancy here between the Hebrew, the LXX., and New Test., a summary may be seen in Towns. Chr. Arr. As to the Sept. and New Test., it is plain that the same name is meant by both. The chief diversity is in the μ, which should seem not to be correct. The Ῥεμφάν of many MSS. of the New Test., to which I can add Lamb. 1182, Mus. 5115, Trin. Coll. B. x. 16, or the Ῥαιφάν of the LXX., seems to be the true spelling. All the most learned inquirers are agreed that by Ῥαφάν, or Ῥαιφάν, was meant SATURN, of whom it was one of the names. And they are almost alike agreed in considering the CHIUH of the Hebrew as only another name of the same idol-deity. MOLOCH is also, with probability, supposed to be another.

Instead of Βαβυλῶνος, the Hebr. and Sept. have Δαμασκου; a remarkable discrepancy, not easily accounted for. Some consider Βαβ. as a slip of memory; which is quite inadmissible. The best mode of dealing with the discrepancy is, to say (with Dr. Henderson, after Bp. Pearce) 'that Stephen has ἑκίκενα Βαβυλῶνος, by way of interpretation.' So that 'while what Amos states is included in the statement made by the Protomartyr, the latter embraces what was known from the fact to be the fulfilment of the prophecy; the Israelites having been carried, not merely beyond Damascus, but beyond Babylon, into the country of the Medes.' Indeed, as Mr. Alford observes, 'the fulfilment of the prophecy would make it very natural to substitute that name which had become inseparably connected with the prophecy.'

44. The purpose of the speaker in this and the three next verses is to moderate that self-complacent pride, which the Jews entertained with respect to their Temple, by reminding them that, after the giving of the Law, their ancestors had worshipped God not in a magnificent temple, but in a moveable tabernacle. And therefore, that as the place for Divine worship had been changed at the pleasure of the Deity, so the worship of Him is not so bound to one place, but that it might again be changed from the present Temple to some other place; thus intimating that holiness is not confined to locality.

— ἡ σκηνὴ τοῦ μαρτυρίου.] By this the LXX. express the Hebr. מִקְדָּשׁ הָעֵדוּת at Numb. xvii. 23, so called either with reference to the tables of testimony contained therein; or from its being the place where God gave witness of his glorious presence. See Exod. xxv. 40. Heb. viii. 5.

— καθὼς διετάξατο, &c.] The construction is elliptical; and the sense, expressed in full, would have been, '[so built] as He who had conversed with Moses (i. e. Jehovah) had commanded him to build it.' See Exod. xxv. 40, compared with Heb. viii. 5.

45. διαδεξάμενοι scil. σκηνῇ, 'having received it as handed down, in the way of inheritance, from their ancestors.' The words μετὰ

Ἰησοῦ are to be construed immediately after ὁ πατήρ.

— ἐν τῇ κατασχέσει; 'in,' or 'at their taking possession of it.'

46. ᾔτησατο εὐρεῖν] I have already, in my Suppl. Volume, proved that the rendering of ᾔτησατο, 'desired,' is quite untenable, and have shown that in the two passages adduced in proof, 1 Kings xix. 4, and Eccles. xi. 10, the real sense is, 'requested for himself,' followed in the former passage by an Infinit., as here. The difficulty involved in εὐρεῖν is only evaded, not removed, by rendering it, on very precarious authority, 'to get,' 'to obtain.' The only clue to unravel the difficulty, is to bring the passage, as I long ago did, into juxtaposition with Ps. cxxii. 2—5, espec. v. 5, on which the use of εὐρεῖν here is founded, where מְצָאָהּ מְצָאָהּ may be rendered, by supplying what is necessary to the sense from the preceding member (of which this is an exegetical parallelism), 'Until I have found out a place for [i. e. wherein I may build] a habitation,' &c. For all the former member as far as is to be repeated in the latter. Of course at εὐρεῖν we may suppose a pregnancy of sense, to be filled up accordingly; bearing in mind that the vow there involves an earnest request in prayer, alluded to in the ᾔτησατο here, with reference to what is said at 2 Sam. vii. 2, where David's request to build a house, and at first encouraged so to do by Nathan, is afterwards, on a Divine revelation, forbidden to be thought of.

48. ἀλλ' οὐχ ὁ ὑψιστος ἐν χειροποιήτοις, &c.] This is not said with reference to Solomon; for he sufficiently recognized the truth—that God is to be sought in heaven, and that thither the minds of believers must ascend, by faith. (See 1 Kings viii. 27.) The intent of the words is to reprove the stupidity of the popular notion respecting the Temple, which was such as to suppose that God could be confined to place. (Calv.) In fact, there are, as often after this and such Particles of ratiocination, words left to be supplied; q. d. ['But, although Solomon built for himself an house, we are not to infer that the Most High is confined to earthly domiciles]; for, as saith the Prophet, "Heaven is my throne, and earth is my footstool;" as God needs not such a house, he cannot be limited by it; as Solomon says, 1 Kings viii. 27; leaving it to be inferred, that even that earthly house might be done away with, and the mode of worship be totally changed.

B, C, D, E, and some four cursives, and is cancelled by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. as an explanatory gloss, or an insertion from xvii. 24. But a gloss would not be required; and it is more likely that Luke would use it here, as he did there; and it is found there in all the copies. Nor is it likely to have been interpolated in all the copies but nine. It might be accidentally omitted by a variation of position in the originals,—a very frequent cause of omission. However, internal evidence is equally balanced, and the genuineness of the word is an open question.

49, 50. The variations here from the LXX. Isa. lxvi. 1, 2, are very small, and will almost disappear, if λέγει Κύριος be taken as interposed from what comes after. In the concluding words, indeed, instead of οὐχὶ—πάντα; we have in the LXX. πάντα γὰρ ἐποίησιν ἡ χεὶρ μου, which is countenanced by the Hebrew; where, if our present copies be correct, the sentence is expressed, not interrogatively, but declaratively. But, as Hoffm. has shown, it comes to the same thing, which of the two is taken; but that the interrogation has the more force and spirit, and was therefore more likely to have been adopted by the sacred speaker. Upon the whole, the scope and sentiment are the same in the words of the Prophet in the Hebr. and Sept., and as they are adduced by Stephen; the aim is, to check that proneness to glory in external and imposing worship and service; in order to which the Most High asserts his infinite superiority to every thing earthly and material, and intimates the only Temple, in which he will dwell,—the heart of the spiritual worshipper. See Calv.

51. There is here an abruptness of transition, which has led some to maintain that something was now said which has not been recorded by St. Luke;—a view quite inadmissible. The best Expositors are of opinion that this change of manner, and transition from calm narration to sharp rebuke, was occasioned by some interruption and insult on the part of the auditors. Yet that interruption might not be, as they imagine, by open tumult, and clamours for the death of the prisoner, but rather (as Doddr. and Kuin. suppose) by low but deep murmurings, and quite audible hisses; which will account for and justify the sharp acrimony of subsequent invective in words. To suppose, as do Neander and Alf., that the zeal of our Protomartyr's fervent spirit had been, during the course of his address, worked up into such disgust at the retrospect of a long succession of apostasies, idolatries, rejection of God's Prophets, and their murder of the Just One himself, as to be kindled into a flame of avector, is scarcely to be reconciled with the course suited to an inspired orator, so as to be safely adopted. Of the two epithets by which Stephen apostrophises his hearers, the first, σκληροί, is one in sense frequently employed by the Prophets in speaking of obstinate and perverse Israel (see my Lex. in v.); the second, less frequently, but here with much point of censure; and no wonder, for, as circumcision was always considered as a symbol of moral purity, so περιτομή is, in Scripture, often applied to the mind and heart. See Jer. iv. 4. Accordingly, by ἀπερίτμητοι τῇ καρδίᾳ are meant those who are actuated by the carнал mind, which is 'enmity against God,' Rom. ii. 29, and viii. 7. Comp. Levit. xxvi. 41, and Ezek. xlv. 9.

By ἀπερίτμ. τοῖς ὠσίν are meant those who turn a deaf ear to all calls to repentance and reformation, 'whose ear (in the words of Jerem. vi. 10) is uncircumcised, and they cannot hearken.'

—ἀει—ἀντιπλήττετε] 'ye perpetually resist the Holy Spirit,' i. e. by rejecting the testimony of those who speak by the Holy Spirit; which is regarded as tantamount to resisting the Holy Spirit himself. See Matt. x. 40, and the parallel passages. Their forefathers had in like manner, as themselves, rejected the prophets sent from God, and inspired by the Holy Spirit. How ἀντιπλήττειν comes to mean this, see my Lex.

52. τίνα τῶν προφ. οὐκ ἐδῶξαν] A strong mode of assertion, but not to be pressed to the very letter, but only regarded as presenting a general truth, and pointing at it as a national characteristic.

—τοῦ Δικαίου] 'the Messiah;' the term being used κατ' ἐξοχὴν to denote Christ. See ch. iii. 14, 22, and note on Luke xxiii. 47. That the name was used by the Jews to denote the expected Messiah, Bp. Middleton has fully proved. I would add, that sometimes the Latin Justus is so used. Thus I find it in a fragm. of Victorinus's treatise de Fabrica Murali, preserved in the Lambeth Library, and published in vol. iii. pp. 455—461, of Routh, Rel. Sacr., where, at pp. 459—466, we have 'auctoritatem totius creature justus;' where for 'auctoritatem' Walker rightly emends 'auctor autem;' but (pace viri eruditissimi Routhii) he does not rightly emend

*Jesus for justus, since justus (write and point the justus.) will yield the same sense, and with far more point.*

53. ἰδὲν. τὸν νόμ. εἰς διαταγὰς ἀγ. I have already shown that, of the many expositions offered of this difficult passage most are very ill founded, and scarcely any are to be entirely approved. The best key to open out the difficulty was presented by Calvin in the kindred passage at Gal. iii. 19, comp. with Heb. ii. 2, νόμος — λαληθεῖς δι' ἀγγέλων. But he did not himself use the key aright, in rendering εἰς διατ. by 'disposition,' 'arrangement.' He should rather have said 'promulgatione.' The true interpretation, however, would seem to be, 'at the announcement of angels.' The sense presented in Mr. Alford's interpretation, 'at the injunction of angels,' is precluded by there being no sufficient authority for such a sense of διατ. I am persuaded that the same sense is intended in both passages—this and Gal. iii. 19; and, as in the latter, the true sense in full must be, that 'the Law given by God was announced by angels' (comp. Joseph. Antt. xv. 3, ἡμῶν τὰ κάλλιστα τῶν δογματῶν καὶ τὰ ὑσιώτατα τῶν ἐν τοῖς νόμοις δι' ἀγγέλων παρὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ μεθόντων), so in the latter, that the people received the law 'at the announcement,' or as we, 'proclamation of angels.' Of this sense of εἰς, comp. another ex. in Matt. xii. 41, μετεπέστην εἰς τὸ κήρυγμα Ἰωῆ. It is a strong confirmation of the truth of the above interpretation, that, while the august solemnity, with which the Law was announced, must have given it additional majesty in the eyes of those who received it, it tended to aggravate the guilt of such of their posterity as should desert or violate it.

— οὐκ ἐψυλάξατε Here the discourse seems to have been interrupted; otherwise there would have been adduced the inferences and the application from what had been thus far spoken: on which see note at ver. 1.

54. διεπρίοντο ταῖς καρδίαις αὐτῶν 'They were cut asunder in their hearts.' See note, supra v. 33, and add Shakesp., 'O Hamlet, thou hast cleft my heart in twain!'

55. Πνεύματος ἁγίου Meaning the influence of the Holy Spirit, animating and supporting him under the trial he had to encounter.

— εἶδε δόξαν Θεοῦ Many recent Commentators here recognize no more than a strongly figurative mode of expression, importing full persuasion of what he did not see, as if he actually saw it. But the words will not, without great violence, admit of such a construction; and, indeed, this is at once forbidden by the words following, ἰδοὺ, θεωρῶ, in which is a positive assertion of something really seen. By the δόξαν

Θεοῦ we may, with most Expositors, understand the Shekinah, or symbol of the Divine presence; supposing the visual faculties of the illustrious Protomartyr to have been, miraculously, so strengthened, that the heavens and the throne of God were made visible to him.

— Ἰησοῦν ἐστῶτα ἐκ δεξιῶν τοῦ Θεοῦ This, it has been justly supposed, was intended to suggest to the holy martyr the present help and support he might expect from the Divine power. Comp. a similar passage in Zech. iii. 1, where the Prophet sees Ἰησοῦν τὸν ἱερέα τῶν μέγαν ἐστῶτα πρὸ προσώπου ἀγγέλου Κυρίου.

56. οὐρανοὺς ἀνεωγμένους Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit. from 3 uncial MSS., and 3 others, διανοίγμ.; while Griesb. and Scholz retain ἀνεωγμ., which is confirmed by Matt. iii. 16. Luke iii. 21. Rev. xix. 11. But internal evidence is in favour of διαν., which may have been used by St. Luke, since it frequently occurs in the Sept., several times in his own Gospel, and occasionally in the later Greek writers. In the present instance the use of the preposition in comp. would have a peculiar suitableness, since the full sense here intended is, 'laid open by being disclosed to view,' so that the Son of Man should be seen. The word was likely to have been used by 'Luke the physician,' since it occurs in the medical writers. So appropriate a term ought not to have been discarded, as it has been, on slender authority, by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., at Mark vii. 35, καὶ εὐθὺς διανοίχθησαν, where, for διαν., they read ἠνοίχθησαν. The δι is called for by the διανοίχθαι occurring just before, and is highly suitable to the idea of opening the ears, as appears from a passage of Lucian, Contempl. xxi., Μὴδ' ἐν τρυτάειν ἐτι διανοίχθαι αὐτοῖς τὰ ὦτα.

57. συνίσχον τὰ ὦτα This was meant as a symbolical action, expressive of detestation and abhorrence; as is plain from the passages of the Classical and Rabbinical writers adduced in Recens. Syn. So Plut., vol. ii. p. 1095, τὰ ὦτα καταλήψην ταῖς χερσὶ δυσχεραίνων καὶ βδελυττόμενος; That κράξαντες must be considered in the same light, and not be viewed as merely meant to drown the voice of Stephen, is plain from a passage of Irenæus, cited by Wetstein.

— ἐκβαλόντες 'having hurried him out of the city.' Comp. Luke iv. 29.

— ἐλιθοβόλουν Since we have a little further on καὶ ἐλιθοβόλουν τὸν Στ., Markland complains of an unnecessary repetition of the same thing. The difficulty, however, may be removed by either (with Heinr.) considering the first ἐλιθοβ. as denoting preparation for action;

q. d. 'they set about stoning him,' or rather (with Klotz, Pearce, Rosenm., and Kuin.), by taking the thing as expressed more Historicorum, first generally, by anticipation, and then (after an insertion respecting the keeping of the clothes by Saul) particularly, narrating by whom he was stoned, and describing some circumstances which attended the stoning.

— ἀτίθειντο] A necessary preparation, since the stones destined for such a purpose were exceedingly large. This laying aside the garments, in order to be lighter for any office, was usual with the long-vested inhabitants of Greece as well as of the East, and is alluded to by Aristoph. Vesp. 408, ἀλλὰ θοιμάτια βαλόντες, θείτε, καὶ βοᾶτε, καὶ—ἀγγέλλετε.

Though the whole proceeding was illegal and tumultuary, yet (as Beza and Grot. observe) the actors conformed to the letter of the law; which directed that, in cases of stoning, the witnesses should cast the first stone,—doubtless to denote their responsibility for what was done.

59. ἐπικαλούμενον, &c.] Bentley and Valckn. propose to insert Θεόν. The ΘΝ, they think, might easily have been absorbed by the preceding ΟΝ. But that this should have happened in all the MSS., for I find not a single copy in the Lamb., Mus., or Trin. Coll. collections, is exceedingly improbable, and the propounding it very disgraceful to the Prince of Critics. If, indeed, we were compelled to suppose invocation to God, it is difficult to see how any thing short of the express insertion of the word could be admitted. That, however, is not the case; and why the Commentators should have been so anxious to make Stephen offer up invocation to God, I know not; since, as Markland truly observes, 'it were contrary to Stephen's intention,—which was to die a martyr to the Divinity of Jesus Christ. So that it is only Him he invokes.' There is surely no reason why Κυρίου Ἰησοῦν should not be supplied from the following words of the invocation, Κύριε Ἰησοῦ, sub-auditions from the context being, even in the Class. writers (espec. Thueyd.), sometimes taken from the words which follow.

That ἐπικαλεῖσθαι can have no other sense than 'addressing by prayer and supplication,' has been established beyond all controversy by Bp. Horsley against Priestley, and by Dr. P. Smith, Scrip. Test. vol. iii. p. 38. Equally plain is it that Jesus is the object to which this prayer was addressed; a point, indeed, fully admitted by Kuin., who here compares Rev. xxii. 29, where, in the words ἔρχου, Κύριε Ἰησοῦ, it is certain that Jesus is addressed in prayer, as he is here, in terms which necessarily imply Divine power, and nothing short of DEITY; even in language borrowed from his own holy example. See Luke xxiii. 34.

— δέξαι τὸ πνεῦμά μου] Using, in substance, the same prayer as his Lord had done, on the cross, to his Father; meaning, as the best Commentators are agreed, 'receive my soul into the mansions of the blessed.' A mode of expression to denote the being 'with Christ, where He is, and to behold his glory.' 'Thereby,' as Dr. Smith observes, 'asking the greatest good that immortal existence can receive, or even Omnipotent Love bestow.'

60. μὴ στήσης α. τὴν αμ. τ.] I am still of opinion that the simplest and truest interpretation of the words is, 'Do not put this their sin into the scale which contains their sins; do not impute it to them; lay it not to their charge, reckon it not.'

— ἐκοιμήθη] A not unfrequent euphemism to denote 'dying,' found in Soph., but not in Class. writers downward, though often occurring in the Sept., from which it was adopted by the Jews (see exx. in Wetst., on Matt. xxvii. 52), and by the early Christians, as a usual Christian term to denote 'death.' Nevertheless, considering the origin of this signification (on which see my Lex.) it would seem that here Luke meant to designate the death of Stephen as calm and peaceful, notwithstanding the extreme violence with which it was inflicted. Otherwise the term would have been unsuitable under the circumstances of the case. And I am not sure that Soph. Elect. 500, in the pathetic epode, containing the words αὐτὸς γὰρ ὁ ποτισθεὶς Μυρτίλος ἐκοιμήθη, did not intend to allude to the quietness of the death in question, since physiologists are agreed that drowning is almost the easiest of deaths, as it seems Soph. was aware, though another Poet of equal distinction says, following the vulgar notion, in his King Richard III. i. 4, 'Methought what pain it was to drown.' The fine passage from the Greek Anthology, cited by Wetst., Ἀκάθιος ἰερὸν ὕπνον Κοιμάται (an imitation of the Homeric κοιμήσατο χάλκειον ὕπνον) Θνήσκων μὴ λέγει τοῖς θνατοῖς, must have been written by a Christian poet, who probably had this passage of Luke in mind.

VIII. 1—4. Persecution of the Church by Saul, as resulting from the same bitter spirit which brought Stephen to his death. Accordingly the portion ought not to have been dissevered from the preceding context by the present division of the chapters. On the force of συνευδ. and its construction, see my Lex.—Ἐν ἡμέρᾳ cannot mean 'on that very day,' but 'at the very time,' namely, when Stephen was stoned.—Ἐγένετο, lit. 'there began to be,' took place.—πάντες must be taken, with limitation, to denote 'the generality' of the dispersion, consisting, perhaps, of all but the lower ranks, whose obscurity might cause them to be overlooked.

1. πλὴν τῶν ἀποστόλων] They, it seems, remained, in order at once to support the courage of those who stayed behind, and by their steadfastness confirm the faith of those who had fled; being protected by the especial providence of God, for the purpose of first building up the Church at Jerusalem by their zeal and energy, and afterwards governing it by their wisdom.

2. συνεκόμισαν] The word properly signifies 'to bring together;' but it is specially used as a funeral term, like the Latin componere; denoting not only the laying out of the body, but all other preparations for its interment; nay also, as here, the funeral rites themselves. This sense is so rare in the Class. writers, that I know of only one example, Soph. Aj. 1068, τόνδε τὸν μικρὸν χερσὶν μὴ συγκομίζειν.

— εὐλαβεῖς] It is a point somewhat disputed, whether these persons were Christians, or Jews. Most Commentators are of opinion that they were religious Jews, or Hellenistic proselytes, and perhaps secret friends to Christianity. They probably consisted of religious men, both Christians and well-disposed Jews. So Luke ii. 25, such a one is called δικαῖος καὶ εὐλαβής.

3. ἐλυμαίνεται τὴν ἐκκλησίαν] Δυμαίνεσθαι is a term properly applied to wild beasts, whose nature it is to ravage and destroy; though not unfrequently used, as here, of violent and injurious men, who, like 'ravening wolves,' waste or spoil, destroy, and persecute; so answering to what St. Paul says of himself, Gal. i. 13, ἰδίωκον τὴν ἐκκλησίαν τοῦ Θεοῦ καὶ ἐπόρθεον αὐτήν. The general sense, then, intended in each passage is 'to bring down by persecution to utter ruin.' Comp. Xen. Hist. ii. 3, 23, λυμ. τὴν πολιτείαν. Indeed here τὴν ἐκκλησίαν (a noun of multitude) may be considered used as an ecclesiastical πολιτεία, being 'a society of faithful persons called out of the world.' The words just after, κατὰ τοὺς οἴκους εἰσπορ. may be taken with what precedes, and thus the Participle will be one of mode or manner, viz., by making entrance at houses, house by house; as also σύρων, which follows, 'by having drawn;' for the τε after σύρων must not be taken with καὶ, otherwise the construction will be destroyed.

4—12. Philip the Deacon preaches the Gospel in Samaria.

5. κατελθὼν εἰς πόλιν τῆς Σαμ.] This is by almost all Translators and Expositors taken to mean, 'having gone down to the city of Samaria;' and so also Dr. Robinson, in his Bibl. Researches, and his Lex. New Test., where he has some interesting particulars both as to the ancient and modern state of that city, with references to the Old Test. and Josephus. Strange, however, it is, that he should derive the name from Hebr. גִּישׁוּ, 'watch-height,' which, however specious a derivation, is precluded by the most important of his own authorities, 1 Kings xvi. 24, where it is recorded of Samaria that Omri, king of Israel, 'bought the hill,' on which the city of Samaria was built by him, 'of Shemer for two talents of silver, calling the name of the city after the name of Shemer, the former owner of the hill גִּישׁוּ;' as we should say, 'Shemer's town,' which, by the change of the Hebr. termination into a Greek one, became Σαμαρ-ία, which in process of time gave its name to the Province of which it was the capital. It may, however, be doubted whether the sense here is 'the city of Samaria,' or 'a city of Samaria.' The former would rather require the Article. Besides, ἡ Σαμ. elsewhere means the Province; not to say that the city was not then in existence; having been, as Joseph. attests, utterly destroyed, and every vestige of it removed, by Hyrcanus; though Herod the Great afterwards built a city near the site, and called it Sebaste, which name it still retains, at least in that of the village which occupies its site. We have no proof that this Sebaste was ever called Samaria, though it became the capital of the Province of Samaria, notwithstanding that Mr. Alf. asserts it, on the authority of Joseph. Antt. xv. 6, 2. But there is Σαμαρείαν seems to mean the Province (q. d. 'that he went out of Syria into Samaria'), as the context rather requires; and the parallel account in the Bell. ii. 12, 6, confirms. I cannot doubt that the sense here is, 'to a city of Samaria,' namely, that mentioned in John iv. 5, ἔρχεται εἰς πόλιν Σαμαρείαν λεγομένην Συχάρ. This city had been at all times a place of wealth and importance, so as by degrees to rival its neighbour Samaria, and afterwards Sebaste. Accordingly, it would be likely that Philip should go thither to evangelize, since he must have heard that the Gospel had been already preached there by the Saviour himself, and with considerable success (John iv.). Hence there is no wonder that the people should have, with one accord, attended to the preaching of Philip, and, as we find from v. 14, 'received the word of God' in faith.

8. χαρὰ μεγάλη] Meaning, as Calvin explains, 'joy in the Holy Ghost, as the fruit of faith.' Indeed, ver. 8 may be said to connect with ver. 6; the intervening one being, in some measure, parenthetical. The γάρ there is illustrious: where also we have an example of δὲ without a μὲν preceding; a use extremely rare. Here, however, χαρὰ may have a double sense—1. joy at the miraculous cures effected on so many deplorable objects; and 2. joy in the Holy Ghost, at the wonderful spread of the Gospel.

9. Σίμων] Expositors in general are agreed that this is Simon the Cypriot, mentioned by Joseph. Antt. xx. 5, 2.

— ἄνθρωπος—ὀνόματι Σίμων] The words of Jos. Antt. xx. 7, 2 (to which I have referred in my note on these words) are these: Σίμωνα, ὀνόματι Ἰουδαίου, Κύριον δὲ γένος, μάγον εἶναι σκηπτόμενον. Whiston, however, thinks that "the Simon of Josephus could not be the Simon of St. Luke, because the latter was not properly a Jew, but a Samaritan, as we learn from Justin Martyr, as also the writer of the Apostolical Constitutions, v. 47, and the writer of the Recognitions of Clement, ii. 6, who say nothing of his being the author of any Jewish heresies, but of his being the author of the first Gentile heresies, that of the Gnostics." This opinion, however, has been confuted by Mosheim, and several other writers since his time. Whiston himself grants, that were we not assured by Joseph. as to his being a Cypriot Jew, though the name, the profession, and the wickedness of them both, would strongly incline one to believe them the same person. But as to the argument that the Simon of the Acts was not properly a Jew, but a Samaritan, that is of no great force, since Josephus does not say that the Simon he speaks of was a Jew proper, but only that he was a Jew BY NAME, i. e. so called: which circumstance will be very reconcilable with his being a Samaritan by birth, as Justin Martyr and others attest. Nor is there any thing insuperable in the objection that Josephus calls him Κύριον δὲ γένος, because that may only mean a Cypriot by descent. It should seem, that this Simon was descended from a Jewish family, which had settled in Cyprus; but had afterwards migrated to Palestine, and resided in Samaria, where, it seems, Simon was born. As to the construction here, προὔπηρχεν is to be taken with ἐν τῇ πόλει, and μαγεύων means 'professing the art of magic,'

in common, we learn, with many other impostors, who took advantage of the credulity of the multitude.

— ἐξίσταται] 'by throwing into amazement.' See note on Matt. xii. 23, and Luke xxiv. 22. So Athen. says of a similar impostor, ὅς τις πῦρ τε αὐτόματον ἰσχυρὰ ἀναφύσσει, καὶ ἄλλα πολλὰ φάσματα ἰσχυρὰ, ἀφ' ὧν ἐξίσταται τῶν ἀνθρώπων τὴν διάνοιαν.

— λέγων εἶναι τινα ἐαυτὸν μέγαν] 'affirming himself to be some extraordinary person.' See note supra v. 36.

10. οὗτός ἐστιν ἡ δύναμις, &c.] Meaning, by hypallage, 'the mighty power of God energizes in him.' Literally, 'this is the manifestation of the power of God.' Comp. the name Γαβριήλ, which means ἡ δύναμις τοῦ Θεοῦ, i. e. 'one invested with authority from God.' To the present purpose is what Porphyry, de Abstin. l. ii. p. 203, says of demons: βούλονται εἶναι θεοί, καὶ ἡ προεστῶσα αὐτῶν δύναμις ('the power which rules over them') δοκεῖν θεός εἶναι ὁ μέγιστος, scil. βούλειται.

— ἡ μεγάλη] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read, from five uncial MSS. and nine others, besides the Vulg. and some later Versions, ἡ καλουμένη μεγάλη. But the word evidently came from a Scholium, the purpose of which was to indicate the force of the Article. Accordingly, a few copies have ἡ λεγομένη μεγάλη. Certain it is, that the Pesch. Syr. Translator had not the word in his copy; nor do I find it in any of the Lamb. or Mus. copies.—Προσείχον αὐτῷ, lit. 'minded him,' attended to, attached themselves to him, as his followers,—a very uncommon idiom, the only examples I know being in Jos. Bell. i. 2, 3, προσείχον τῷ Πτολεμαίῳ, and Diog. Laert. i. 2, 3, προσείχον αὐτῷ ὁ δῆμος.

13. ἦν προσκαρτερῶν τ. Φ.] 'used to closely attend on Philip,'—namely, as a disciple. See x. 7. In so doing he appears to have been influenced solely by secular views.

— δυνάμεις καὶ σημεῖα] This, for σημεῖα καὶ δυνάμεις μεγάλας, found in very many MSS. (to which I add all the Lamb., and nearly all the Mus. copies), Versions, Fathers, and early Editions, I have, with all the Editors, from Matthæi downwards, received.

John was, that they might lay hands with prayer on the new converts, and thereby impart to them the gifts of the Holy Spirit. Indeed, the Apostles seem to have laid down a rule, that converts, after being baptized and catechized, should have the imposition of hands, accompanied with prayer, in order to their receiving the gifts of the Holy Spirit.

such justification of a violent expression can be thought of in an Apostle. In fact, there is nothing in the passage before us that amounts to imprecation. As to the words τὸ ἀργύριόν σου σὺν σοὶ εἶη, they need not, and, I think, ought not, to be closely united in sense with εἰς ἀπώλειαν; since they merely import, as often, by supposing an emphasis on the pronoun, 'May your money rest with yourself;' 'keep your money to yourself' [I will have nothing to do with it]. Thus in a similar passage of Jos. Antt. x. 11, 3, Δαυηλὸς δὲ τὰς δωρεὰς ἡζίου αὐτὸν ἔχειν τὸ σοφὸν γὰρ καὶ τὸ θεῖον ἀμφοδόκητον εἶναι: where, though the MSS. present no variation, I have no doubt that the true reading is, not αὐτόν, but αὐτῷ, which must have been in the copy of Rufinus (of the fifth century). This emendation, indeed, is placed beyond doubt by the passage of Dan. v. 17, which Josephus here followed, and which might also be in the mind of the Apostle: καὶ εἶπε Δαυηλ ἑνώπιον τοῦ βασιλέως Τὰ δώματά σοι ἴστω (or, as the Alexandrian and other MSS. have, σὺν σοὶ), καὶ τὴν δωρεὰν τῆς οἰκίας σου ἑτέρῳ δός. Now the latter clause there expresses a sense, which in the passage before us is left to be understood. Again, neither does the phrase εἰς ἀπώλειαν imply imprecation. By Whitby, Markland, A. Clarke, and others, it is taken to import prediction,—namely, of what would befall him if he did not repent. Yet there is, I apprehend, nothing in the words from which even prediction can be directly elicited. The nature of the expression must depend upon the εἰς, which here seems to denote tendency; as at Rom. v. 16, εἰς κατάρκρια, and vi. 16, ἀμαρτίας (φερόσης) εἰς θάνατον. Thus it is intended to warn him of the end and consequences of so employing money, unless (as he gives him to understand at ver. 22) he averts the danger by timely repentance. Accordingly, the expression may best be regarded as a solemn denunciation. The full sense seems to be: 'Keep your money to yourself—for your own perdition [as it will be, unless you repent], not mine;' σου being here supplied from σου preceding.

The above view of the sense is, I find, supported by the authority of Calvin, who observes that Peter does not imprecate, but 'iustam vindictam Dei, incutiendi terroris causâ, denuntiâs propè impendere.' So Gibbon, Decline and Fall, c. 68, says that the Greeks, at the last siege of Constantinople, buried their money rather than contribute it to the service of their country; and that, by thus crippling their own means of defence, their money and themselves became the prey of the enemy, and alike perished. This view I find adopted by Mr. Alford, who observes, that 'this denunciation of Peter, like the declaration of Paul, 1 Cor. vi. 13, has reference to the perishableness of all worldly good, and of those with it, whose chief end is the use of it.'

21. οὐκ ἔστι—κλήρος] This seems to have been a common mode of expression from antiquity, since it occurs in Deut. x. 29. 2 Sam. xx. 1. Most Commentators explain these words to mean no more than this, that 'he should by no means have the power he asked of conferring the Holy Spirit.' That, of course, is implied; but the main sense intended is, that, however he may have pretended to have become a convert to Christianity, he had no part nor lot in the matter of the Gospel, of which he was a professor, and the privileges and blessings it could confer. And why? because 'his heart was not right with God,' so that he could have no share of even the most ordinary privileges it could bestow, much less the extraordinary. — Τῷ λόγῳ τούτῳ, 'the matter I speak of;' for λόγος and ῥῆμα, after the example of the Hebr. דבר, often signify a thing.

— ἢ γὰρ καρδ.—τοῦ Θεοῦ] 'thy heart is not right in God's presence, who sees it as it really is;' thus intimating that his profession of faith was insincere, and his seeking after the Gospel was only a self-seeking.—For ἐνώπ. Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ἐναντίον, from A, B, C, D, and about 16 cursives; to which I can add nothing from the Lamb. and Mus. copies. It may be what Alford says, 'a correction to a more usual word;' but it is not likely to have crept into all the copies except some score. Besides, since Luke has elsewhere used ἐνώπ. very many times, and ἐναντί or ἐναντίου only once in this sense, Luke i. 8, it is likely that ἐναντίον arose from critical alteration to improve the Grecism, as is manifestly the case infra x. 4, ἐνώπιον τοῦ Θεοῦ, where ἐμπροσθεν is found in A, B, and a few cursives, and is adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.

22. εἰ ἄρα ἀφεθήσεται, &c.] El ara is by many Commentators taken in the sense ut, as εἰπὼς at Phil. iii. 11, and sometimes in the Class. writers. But that is quite inadmissible by the very nature of this peculiar form εἰ ara, which when occurring anywhere except at the beginning of a sentence, is elliptical; and some Participle, suitable to the context, of 'trying,' is generally to be understood. So Mark xi. 13, εἰ ara εὐρίσκει τι. Acts xvii. 27, εἰ ara γε ψηλαφῆσαιεν. Comp. Numb. xxii. 11, εἰ ara δυνήσονται πατάσαι αὐτόν. There is, of course, in the nature of the form, some doubt or uncertainty implied. Here, however, as the best Expositors are agreed, it is not whether, on sincere repentance, Simon would be forgiven, but whether he would sincerely repent. This is clear from the words of the next verse, εἰς γὰρ χολήν,

&c., which are illustrative of the matter, and show that the doubt rested on the state of Simon's heart towards God. Mr. Alf. pronounces the uncertainty to be, 'whether or not his sin may not have come under the awful category of the unpardonable one, specified by our Lord Matt. xii. 31, to which words the form ἀφεθήσεται has a tacit reference.' But that is a purely gratuitous fancy, and supposes a greater acquaintance with the Gospel system than Simon probably had. Besides, it was evidently not the Apostle's intention to drive him into despair. So Matth. Henry well remarks, 'Though he would have him see his case to be bad, yet he would not have him think it desperate.' So, too, Calvin observes, that Peter did not use this expression of doubt, in order to leave Simon's mind in a state of perplexity, 'sed ut magis ad vehementiam precandi stimulet. Ergo non inquit Petrus Simoni terrorem, qui impetrandi fiduciam evortat in ejus corde vel perturbet, sed spem illi certam faciens, si supplex petierit atque ex animo tantum exortandi ardoris causâ veniam pro sceleris pravitate difficilem esse commemorat. Necesse enim est, ut fides nobis in audentio Deo præluat, imo ut sit precationis mater.' Mr. Alf. truly remarks, that this verse with John xx. 23, shows 'how completely the Apostles themselves referred the forgiveness of sins to, and left it in, the sovereign power of GOD, and not to their own delegated power of absolution.' But if this be so, how came the remarker to admit Κυρίου into his text for Θεοῦ, on the authority of 5 uncials, and a few cursives (to which I can only add one Mus. copy, 16,184), pronouncing Θεοῦ as a correction from v. 21, or a doctrinal alteration? If so, it must have been a very early correction, since Θεοῦ is found in the Pesch. Syr. Version, formed at the middle of the 2nd century. Θεός and Κύριος are often interchanged by the scribes, partly because the abbreviations were somewhat similar. See Luke ix. 57. Acts x. 33. xvi. 10. xxi. 20. Rom. xiv. 4. 1 Cor. vii. 17. x. 10. 2 Cor. v. 8. 2 Thess. iii. 3. iii. 16. 2 Tim. ii. 14. James iii. 9. Rev. xi. 4. Inasmuch that external evidence is of less weight than usual; and internal evidence sometimes draws two ways. And accordingly, between the carelessness of scribes, and the rash presumption of Critics, the reading is occasionally an open question, not to be decided until far more attention be paid to the exact collation of the cursive MSS.

23. εἰς γὰρ χολήν—δύνα] These words are commonly taken as put for ἐν γὰρ χολῇ, &c. The best Commentators, however, from Alberti and Wolf down to Kuinoel, have been of opinion that εἰς χολήν is for χολήν, as Acts xiii. 22, 47. vii. 21. Eph. ii. 15; q. d. 'I see thou art a most pernicious person, like to a bitter and poisonous plant, a pest to Christian society;' and they compare Anthol. Gr. ii. 11, πάσα γυνή χόλος ἐστίν. In like manner σύνδισμος they take to mean 'a mere bundle of iniquity.' But the construction they propound is not established by the passages above adduced; for there eis is for ἕστε, and there is an ellipsis of εἰς; which is not the case here. Besides, the style of unmeasured reproach involved in the interpretation in question is by no means characteristic of the sacred writers; whose language, like that of our Lord, is sometimes severe, but never opprobrious. I would therefore rather acquiesce in the common interpretation, which yields a sense, though strictly just, yet little less severe,—namely, 'thou art immersed in wickedness of the vilest sort, and fast bound in the chains of sin and Satan.' Eis may be taken for ἐν, as often in the New Test. and the Class. writers, for the at may imply in, with πικρία understood; and χολήν πικρίαν, by Hebraism, for χολήν πικροτάτην. See note on Matt. xxvii. 34. In eis σύνδεσμον there is a constructio prægians for art '(fallen) into and art in;' on which idiom (often occurring in New Test.) see Winer, Gr. 954, 4. In σύνδεσμον there is an allusion to sin as holding its victim en-chained, under bondage, and the best comment on this expression are such passages as Pa. cxvi. 16. Prov. v. 22. Rom. vii. 23. viii. 21. Heb. ii. 15. 2 Pet. ii. 9.

²⁵ πολλὰς τε κώμας.—εὐηγγ.] lit. 'evangelized many villages' (i. e. such as were on or near the road to Jerusalem); meaning, 'the persons there;' as infra v. 41. xiv. 15, 21. The Apostles stopped, we may suppose, for a longer or shorter time at the villages, according to circumstances; but it would seem that the seed of the Gospel was on that journey sown to a considerable extent in Samaria.

²⁶ ἀγγελοι.—ἐλάλησε] Many recent Commentators suppose this communication to have been made by a dream. But there is surely nothing in the air of the passage to warrant this supposition; and it is no wonder that Philip should have been admonished sometimes (as at 29 and 39) by the internal suggestions of the Holy Spirit, and sometimes (as here) by the personal address of an angel. Other instances of angelic ministrations permitted for various important purposes in the early stage of evangelization, we have supra v. 19, infra x. 3. xii. 7.

—αὕτη ἐστὶν ἔρημος] These words have occasioned no little perplexity; inasmuch that Wesseling and Valcknaer are ready to cut them out as an interpolation from the margin. In endeavouring to explain them, some Expositors, referring the words to Γάζαν, suppose that there were then two Gazas—New Gaza and Old Gaza, destroyed by Alexander, the latter of which they think is here meant. Others (comprehending the most eminent Commentators, ancient and modern), referring the words to τὴν ὁδόν, suppose that there were two roads leading from Jerusalem to Gaza; one farther about, and carried along the valley of the river Eschol; the other shorter, but traversing the rough tract of mount Casius, and therefore desert and unfrequented. That there were two roads, is certain from the Antonine Itinerary and the Pentinger Table, which trace two different courses. But whether either of those roads is the ὁδὸς here specified may be doubted. That would seem to be the very old road mentioned by Dr. Robinson, Bibl. Rea. ii. 478, leading direct from Jerusalem to Gaza through the Wadi Musurr, and over the Beit Jibrin which he describes as at present without towns or villages; and, from its physical features, likely to have been so at the period in question. As to the objection of Reland, that no reason can be imagined why that road should be called ἔρημος, any more than any other road in Judæa—that is supposing far more knowledge, than we can now possess of the state of the country in those times. But surely it might be styled ἔρημος, for if it was carried in a straight course, as it would be likely to be, and as roads were formed in ancient times, it must have passed most of the way over a hilly and barren tract, through no city or town of any note. And therefore the epithet ἔρημος, which merely means 'very thinly peopled,' as being on a barren tract, would be suitable enough. So Arrian, Exp. Alex. iii. 21, 11, Οἱ δὲ αἰδῖναι μὲν ἴφασσαν (they said they knew a road), ἱέρημην δὲ εἶναι τὴν ὁδὸν δὲ ἀνυδρίαν. Thucyd. i. 50, 3, Σύβωτα—λιμὴν ἔρημος. But the most apposite passage to prove this sense is Xen. Cyrop. iii. 12, 1, ἀγροσιν αὐτὸν ὁδὸν ἔρημον εἰς Πηλῶσιον. I am now decidedly of opinion that the ἦτις must refer to the ὁδὸς. As to whether the words are those of the Angel or of the Evangelist, on carefully re-considering this quæstio vana, I am of opinion that, although they may be from the Evangelist—and from their descriptive character may seem less suitable to an angelic address, than to an historical notice intended to point at the hardships a pedestrian missionary would encounter in traversing an unfrequented and almost unpeopled tract—yet I am inclined to think, that they are those of the Angel, and may be best rendered, ‘The way (I am pointing out to thee) is desert, almost uninhabited.’ The circumstance was, we may imagine, mentioned in order to intimate to Philip the necessity of providing himself with provisions and other necessities for the way.

27. Εὐνοῦχος signifies properly cubicularius, ‘chamberlain, prefect of the bed-chamber or harem,’ especially the royal one. And as such were generally castrati; so it came to mean spado, ‘an eunuch.’ And from such persons being, for their supposed fidelity, generally promoted to other confidential court offices, the term came at last to mean, in a general way, ‘an officer of state’ (so here a Treasurer, as we find from what follows) whether an eunuch or not. Thus Potiphar, Gen. xxxix. 1, though called εὐνοῦχος Φαραώ, yet had a wife. In the same sense, too, the word occurs in Joseph. Antt. xvi. 8. 1. Δυνάστης signifies properly ‘one who has great power or influence’ (and so we have μέγας εἶναι τι frequently occurring in the ancient writers): whence it comes to mean magnas, ‘a grandee.’ So Xen. Cyrop. iv. 5, 14, ταῦταί οἱ τοῦ Ἀσσυρίου βασιλείας καὶ ἄλλων δυναστῶν. Wolf, and Wetstein have proved from Pliny, Dio Cass., and Strabo, that Candace was a family name, common to the Queens of Ethiopia Superior, or Meroe, like Pharaoh to the kings of Egypt. This person was, no doubt, a Jewish proselyte; as appears, not so much by his reading the Prophet Isaiah, as by his coming to Jerusalem to worship there. As to his being called εὐνοῦχος, that by no means precludes the supposition; since the expression (as we have just seen) is not to be understood in the physical sense. Otherwise, indeed, he could not have been a proselyte, unless, indeed, of the Gale; since eunuchs were not admitted.

28. The reading in this verse varies; and Editors are divided in opinion. The reading presented by Iachm. and Tisch. is, ἦν τε ὑποστρέφων καθήμενος ἐπὶ τοῦ ἄρματος αὐτοῦ ἀναγινώσκων, &c. But for this reading there exists but slender authority; and I have little doubt but that the true reading and punctuation of the passage is ὃς εἰς Ἱερουσαλὴμ ἦν τε ὑποστρέφων, καὶ καθήμενος ἐπὶ τοῦ ἄρμ. αὐτοῦ, ἀνεγίνωσκε, &c., ‘who had gone to Jerusalem, and was returning home; and [who], as he was sitting in his chariot, was reading the prophet Isaiah.’ Thus καθήμενος is used, like the Latin gerund, by way of indicating the circumstances which accompany a certain action when done. The text I propose differs from the text rec. only in the removal of καὶ before ἀνεγίνωσκε, which seems to have been introduced by some correctors, who were ignorant of the construction of this somewhat irregularly composed sentence. To turn from words to things;—something similar is recorded in a passage of Jos. Antt. xx. 2, 4, ἰσὶ αἰσθηθεὶς ἀσπασάμενος αὐτὸν (i. e. Tzetztes, king of Adiabene, a Jewish proselyte) κατέλαβε τὸν Μωϋσῆν νόμον ἀναγινώσκοντα.

29. εἶπε τὸ Πνεῦμα] Many ancient Commentators, as Chrys., and, of the modern ones, Bp. Pearce, take this to mean the angel mentioned at v. 26. See Heb. i. 14. This, however, involves great harshness; and it is better, with the most eminent modern Expositors, to regard the words as a popular manner of expression, denoting that such was, as infra x. 19. xvi. 6, 7, the suggestion of the Holy Spirit, so communicated (like the afflatus of the Prophets) as that the inspired person could always distinguish such Divine suggestions from those of his own mind. And thus the Holy Spirit might in a certain sense be said to speak the words to him.

—κολλήθητι τῷ ἄρμ. τ.] Κολλᾶσθαι signifies ‘to attach oneself to, join company with.’ So Ruth ii. 8, κολλήθητι μετὰ τῶν κορσίων μου, ‘join company with my maidens.’ The chariot is here (by a usual popular idiom) for the person in the chariot.

30. γινώσκεις—ἀναγινώσκεις:] Most Commentators, from Grot. downwards, suppose a paronomasia, similar to that of Julian in his laconic Epistle to Basil: Ἀνέγνω, ἔγνω, κατέγνω, to which the Father, with equal wit and scarcely less brevity, replied: Ἀνέγνω, ἀλλ’ οὐκ ἔγνω. εἰ γὰρ ἔγνω, οὐκ ἂν κατέγνω. But paronomasia in the present case would be frigid, and unsuitable to the gravity of the speaker, and the importance of the subject.

32. ὥς πρόβατον—[ὡς αὐτοῦ] These words

are taken from Isa. liiii. 7, 8, and follow the Sept. Version exactly; the verbal discrepancies which occur in the Vatican MS., not being found in the Alexandrian and other good MSS. of the Sept. Between the Sept., St. Luke, and the Hebrew, there is, indeed, considerable difference, but not such as materially to affect the general sense. For the best modes of reconciling the discrepancies the reader is referred to Hoffm. in loc., and to Dr. Henderson in his note on the passage. Suffice it here to say, that the words τὴν δὲ γενεὰν αὐτοῦ are, like the correspondent Hebrew ones (of which they are a literal rendering), so obscure, that their true import has been greatly debated. Hamm., Dodd., Kuin., and most recent Commentators, take the sense to be, 'Who can describe the guilt of the men of his time [from whom he suffered such things]?' This is confirmed by the suffrage of Dr. Henderson, who, after showing that ἡ ἁμαρτία is strictly an Accusative absolute, assigns as the sense, 'And as to the men of his time, who can conceive of them?' i. e. their atrocious wickedness! ['so conceive, as to express;'] so Sept. διηγῆσεται;] He justly remarks that the best comment on the words is furnished by Joseph. Bell. v. 13, 6, οἱμαὶ Ῥωμαῖον βραδυνόντων ἐπὶ τοῖς ἀλιτρήτοις, ἢ καταποθῆναι ἐν ὑπὸ χάσματος, ἢ κατακλυσθῆναι τὴν πῶλιν, ἢ τοὺς τῆς Σοδομῆς μεταλαβεῖν κηρατοῖς· πολὺ γὰρ τῶν ταῦτα παθόντων ἦν ἡγεῖα· μήτε γενεὰν ἐξ αἰῶνος γεγονέναι κακίας γονιμώτεραν. And further, v. 10, 5, ΓΕΝΕΑΝ ἀνωτίραν.

³⁶ τ. ὑδωρ] Probably some fountain, or pool, formed by a brook either running into the Eschol, or else formed at a bend thereof. Ancient tradition fixes the spot to a place called Bethsur, 20 miles from Jerusalem, as Jerome testifies, on the old road leading to Gaza. This is confirmed by Pocock, who found near a village called Betur, a fountain at the head of a considerable brook [running, I doubt not, into the river Eschol], built over, and near which are the ruins of a Christian Church.

— Ἰδοὺ, ὕδωρ—βαπτισθῆναι;] From this we may infer that Philip had fully instructed the Eunuch on the nature and necessity of baptism as an initiatory ordinance of Christianity, and that the Eunuch had professed his wish to receive, and Philip his willingness to administer, it at a fit opportunity. But there was hardly time for such full instruction; and I agree with Mr. Alf., that there was no need to dilate much thereon, since his own acquaintance with Jewish practices, and the knowledge which he probably had derived at Jerusalem about the new Faith, as resting on Baptism, will account for his request to be baptized.

— τί κωλύει, &c.] An uncommon form of expression, which, however, I have noted elsewhere, in Plut. de Deo Socr.: Τί γὰρ κωλύει μηδενὸς καταφρονεῖν; Aristid. T. ii. p. 89. Τί κωλύει—αὐτὰ ἀντιβαίνει; Jos. Antt. xvi. 2, 4.

³⁷ There has been no little debate as to the authenticity of this verse, which is not found in many of the best MSS. and most of the ancient Versions, including the Peschito-Syriac, and is omitted in several citations of the Fathers, as also in the Edit. Princ. Moreover, in some of the MSS. which do contain it, it is found with great diversity of reading. Hence it is cancelled or rejected by almost all Editors. It was, indeed, defended by Whitby and Wolf—strenuously, but not, I think, successfully. It is surely not, as Wolf contends, necessary to the context. The external evidence against it is certainly, if not equal to that for it, at least pretty strong; and I can add 2 Lamb. and 2 Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16. And the internal is decidedly against it; for no good reason can be imagined why it should have been inserta out, or omitted inadvertently; whereas, for its insertion we may easily account,—namely, from the anxiety of well-meaning but misjudging persons to remove what they thought an abruptness, and to somewhat qualify what they deemed too favourable to haste in administering baptism; moreover to take away a stumbling-block, from the rite not being described as performed in due form. As to Whitby's argument, on the ground that the verse was probably omitted in later times, because it opposed the delay of baptism which the catechumens experienced before they were admitted into the early Church, it has no force whatever. For surely if the verse be removed, the delay of baptism would seem to be still more opposed. The strongest argument brought forward in favour of the authenticity of ἔξασιν. ἀποκριθεὶς δὲ εἶπε· Πιστεύω τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ Θεοῦ εἶναι τὸν Ἰησοῦν Χριστόν.] ³⁸ καὶ ἐκέλευσε στήναι τὸ ἄρμα· καὶ κατέβησαν ἀμφότεροι εἰς τὸ ὕδωρ, ὃ τε Φίλιππος καὶ ὁ εὐνούχος· καὶ ἐβάπτισεν αὐτόν. ³⁹ Ὅτε δὲ ἀνέβησαν ἐκ τοῦ ὕδατος, Πνεῦμα Κυρίου ἤρπασε τὸν Φίλιππον καὶ οὐκ εἶδεν αὐτόν· οὐκέτι ὁ εὐνούχος, ἐπορεύετο γὰρ τὴν ὁδὸν αὐτοῦ ⁴⁰ χαίρων. the passage is, that it was read by Irenæus, by Cyprian, nay, as Mill and others say, by Tertullian. But, upon referring to the passage (de Baptismo, c. 18), I find not a shadow of proof that the verse was read by Tertullian, but rather a probability that it was not. Again, as to the authority of Cyprian, it is by no means great; for he generally does but follow the Vulgate, and that Version has the verse. Finally, its being cited by Irenæus is by no means sufficient to establish its genuineness. Indeed, the authority of Fathers for the authenticity of disputed passages or clauses, is most precarious, because, in their quotations, unless the context require the presence of the words or clauses in question, we cannot be sure that they were not foisted in by scribes and critics of the middle ages from the common text.

still less there; for the expression used in the Sept., ἀνέλαβε, ἤρπασε, καὶ ἐξήρπασε, which are terms synonymous with ἤρπασε here, may be understood of the imperative prompting of the Holy Spirit, which hurried him away; though here, with an allusion to the rapt feeling with which Philip left the Eunuch, and went to Azotus. Comp. Hdot. iv. 13, ἔφη δὲ Ἀριστίνης—ἀπικέσθαι ἐς Ἰσσηδόνας, φοιβόλαμπτος γενόμενος. I am ready, however, to admit, that the description of the occurrence has the air of the supernatural; but I cannot feel warranted in applying to it, with Mr. Alford, the expression 'supernatural disappearance;' because I scruple at confounding this with the supernatural disappearance of our Lord on various occasions; and especially since, in order to regard it in that light, we must interpret the following expression, οὐκ εἶδεν αὐτόν οὐκέτι, as equivalent to the ἀφαντος γίνετο ἀπ' αὐτῶν of Luke xxiv. 31, as said of our Lord. It is strange that Mr. Alford should affirm that the words of 2 Kings ii. 12, οὐκ εἶδεν αὐτόν ἔτι, decide the question,—that the departure of Philip was miraculous. Whereas, if the point depend on that passage, it decides it to be not miraculous; for who can fail to see, that the words are to be referred, not to the ἀνελήφθη, but to διέστειλαν ἀνὰ μέσον ἀμφοτέρων, 'parted them asunder,' διεχώρισαν, as some MSS. read, 'parted them one from the other;' so that, as it is added, 'Elisha saw him no more?' Matth. Henry well remarks, that 'the chariot and horses parted them, as the dearest friends must part, and see each other no more in this world.'

⁴⁰ εὐρέθη εἰς Ἀζ.] In order to solve the difficulty found (or rather, made) here by Expositors, we may either suppose, with Beza, that the passive is used here in a reciprocal or reflexive sense, 'made his appearance;' as in the Hebrew idiom, by which passive forms often have a reciprocal sense, as ἔκρινον. And so even in Greek. Thus in Hdot. iv. 14, we have a passage of similar character, φανέντα αὐτὸν ἐς Προκόον. Or we may suppose, with Heinrichs, and most recent German Expositors, that there is a constructio prænominis; q. d. 'he was hurried away to, and found at, Azotus.'—Ἀζωτον, the ancient Ashdod, now a small village, but retaining the Hebrew form in the name Eadud, but without any ancient remains. See Robinson, Bibl. Res. ii. 629. iii. 1, 232. It was taken by Psammitichus, after a siege of twenty-nine years,—the longest upon record. Hdot. ii. 157.—πᾶσι πάσας, 'in all the principal cities' of that maritime strip of territory which formed the ancient Philistia,—as Ekron, Jamnia, Joppa, Apollonia, and Lydda. (See ix. 38.)

IX. This chapter commences a most important portion of the present book, as being occupied with first narrating the conversion of Saul of Tarsus, and then recording, through the remainder of the book, the labours of this 'chosen vessel' in the establishing of Churches, amidst trials the most appalling, and in spreading the Gospel far and wide among the Gentiles.

1—39. Conversion of Saul. There is great reason to think that what is here related took place before the baptism of the Eunuch, nay, even before the journey of Peter and John into Samaria; the narrative being resumed from viii. 3.

1. ἐμπνέων ἀπειλῆς καὶ φόνου] It is strange that Meyer should charge the ordinary interpretation, 'breathing,' with a neglect of the composition of the word, and should render it 'inhaling,'—a sense not merely flat, as Alford says, but improper, because it destroys the allusion, which is to the breath quickly inhaled, and, by implication, exhaled (so Johnson defines our verb 'to breathe,' 'to inspire and expire'),—an apt representation of strong passion (which occasions quick breathing), espec. love, or hatred, and its results in blood and slaughter. It is used by the best Classical writers, mostly with a Genit. of the passion; so Achill. Tat. I. ii. p. 65, ἔρωτος πν. Arist. Epist. i. 5, θυμοῦ. Q. Calab. xiv. 72, αἱματόεντος ὀρμηγανθοῦ, but sometimes with the Accusat., as Hom. II., μῆνσα πνιόντες, where the Schol. explains by θυμοῦ πν. Eur. Rhes., θυμὸν πν. Theocr. Idyll. xxii. 82, φόνου πν. And so the Latin Poets, 'spirat amores,' 'spirat sanguinem.' There is, indeed, an irregularity in the use of ἀπειλῆς, but not so great as is found in Æschyl. Agam. 213, φρηνὸς πνίνω δυσσεβῆ τροπαίαν Ἀναγών, ἀνίσκρον, in Q. Calab. supra; and many kindred passages might be adduced from Shaksp.

2. ἐν Δαμασκόν] Though perhaps the oldest existing city in the world, Damascus is not to be compared in point of antiquity of origin with several in Egypt, especially Thebes, which, with reason, is said by Diod. Sic. to have been the first city founded on the earth, at a period lost amidst the mists of antiquity. From the populousness of Damascus, including numerous Jewish sojourners, its constant communication with Jerusalem, and its being, probably, the place whither most of those who fled at the murder of Stephen took refuge, the number of Christians was likely to be considerable. So great was the authority of the Sanhedrim with the foreign Jews, that they readily submitted to its decrees in all matters spiritual; as, for instance, the suppression of what was catechized heresy; especially as the then Ruler of Damascus, Aretas, king of Arabia, was either, according to some, a Jewish proselyte, or at least was well affected to the Jews, and permitted the exercise of this authority, in things spiritual, on the part of the Sanhedrim.

— τῇ ὁδῷ] 'of the way' [i. e. of the Lord

Jesus, and his Gospel], meaning 'Christians.' The same idiom recurs infra xix. 3, 23. xxiv. 22. It is plain that ἡ ὁδὸς had become a common mode of expressing 'the Gospel way.' We may compare 2 Pet. ii. 2, ἡ ὁδὸς τῆς ἀληθείας, though even that is not a true example. In the use of the expression there may have been an allusion to ὁδὸς as used of a philosophical sect; but more probably to the phrase ἡ ὁδὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ, or τοῦ Κυρίου, occurring often in the Gospels.

3. Certain foreign Theologians, building on the crude and half-developed views of De Dieu, Elmer, and (sad to say) Hamm., attempt to show, that the circumstances of the conversion of St. Paul, here related, were not miraculous, but produced solely by certain terrific natural phenomena; which, they suppose, had such an effect on the high-wrought imagination, and so struck the alarmed conscience, of Saul, as to make him regard as a reality what was merely produced by fancy,—an hypothesis of which I have fully shown the fallacy in my Recena. Synop. Suffice it here to say, that, however ardent might be the temperament, and vivid the imagination, of the illustrious convert, it is impossible that he could have so far deceived himself as to suppose the conversation here recorded (which he himself relates at large in his speech before Agrippa, and which he describes as in the Hebrew language), really took place, if there had been no more in the case than the above Commentators would suppose. Besides, if he could have been so worked upon by his own high-wrought feelings, that could not have been the case with his attendants. Now it is said that 'they also, struck dumb with astonishment, heard the voice, though they saw no one.' Again, to advert to a few more particulars in the present account, and that of the Apostle himself, infra xxvi., if φωνή there could be taken to denote thunder (though no proof of such a case is established), what were more absurd than 'I heard a clap of thunder saying?' And his fellow-travelers, on hearing the—what?—the clap, and seeing no one (whom, in such a case, could they have expected to see?) were mute with astonishment. Moreover, the expression φῶς, as applied to lightning, is quite unprecedented; nor is lightning any where said περιαστράπτει, where the sense is, 'that a beam of light flashed around him;' as in Luke ii. 9, δόξα Κυρίου περιέλαμπεν αὐτόν. Plut. Arat. 21, φῶτα περιέλαμψε. And how can the description given of this φῶς, that it exceeded the brightness of the mid-day sun, apply to lightning? The light was, doubtless, like that δόξα Θεοῦ presented to the view of Stephen, supra vii. 55; consisting (to use the words of Dr. Henderson) in 'the rays of Christ's glory, which resembled the dazzling effulgence of the Shechinah, or the visible symbol of the Divine presence among the ancient Hebrews.'

Finally, the natural and corporeal presence of Christ on this occasion is required both by the testimony of Ananias and Barnabas, and by that of Paul himself, 1 Cor. ix. 1. xv. 8, where the grand purpose in view is to establish the fact of the resurrection of Christ; to which his own evidence, when added to corroborate that of other witnesses, must be of the same kind with theirs. Indeed (as Dr. Henderson observes, Lect. on Insp. p. 104), 'if he had not seen the real body which was raised from the dead, but only a semblance of it, or if the vision was nothing more than an image of it impressed upon his imagination, he could not, with any propriety, have borne testimony to his resurrection, and consequently must have been disqualified from being an apostle. In short, it may truly be said that a more complete tissue of gratuitous assumption was never thrown around any hypothesis, than the above; and we are warrant in affirming that it is impossible, either psychologically or historically, with the least degree of consistency, to interpret the language of this passage on any principle, than its literal and obvious meaning.'

5. σκληρόν σοι πρὸς κέντρα λακ. A proverbial form, common alike to the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin; expressive of the bootlessness of resistance to superior strength. See Pind. Pyth., Od. ii. 173. Æschyl. Prom. 331. Ag. 1633, and Eurip. Bacch. 791. It is, as the Scholiast on the passage of Pindar observes, a mode of speaking derived from rebellious working cattle kicking against the goads of the ploughman. However, the words σκληρόν—πρὸς αὐτόν are not found in a considerable number of the best MSS. [including almost all the Lamb. and Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16], and Versions, including the Pschito Syriac; nor in several citations of the Fathers, nor in the Edit. Princeps; and they are rejected by almost every Critic of eminence, from Erasmus, Beza, and Grotius, down to Tittman and Vater. Rightly; for notwithstanding what Wolf urges in defence of the passage, there can be little doubt that it was introduced from the parallel passages at xxii. 10. xxvi. 14. It might well be expected that the historia should be less circumstantial than the personal narrator of facts.

7. εἰστήκεισαν ἔννεοι [‘were standing mute with astonishment.’] As this seems at variance with the words πάντων κατακλιόντων ἡμῶν εἰς τὴν γῆν in the account of his conversion, by

St. Paul himself, to Agrippa, Acts xxvi. 14, Commentators have endeavoured in various ways to reconcile the discrepancy. The most approved one is that of Valla and others, who suppose that they had first fallen down, and then risen again. But though this is preferable to that of Beza and others, who remove the difficulty by almost explaining away the εἰστήκεισαν, rendering it ‘were,’ yet it is liable to several objections, which I have stated in Recena. Synop. The best solution may be, to suppose that Paul’s companions, at first, stood fixed, and mute with astonishment; and then, struck with awe at what they regarded as indicating the presence, however invisible, of a supernatural Being, fell with their faces to the ground, as Saul had done. So ἵστημι is used at 2 Kings xxii. 3. John vi. 22. viii. 44. Acts xxvi. 22. 1 Cor. x. 12. Gal. iv. 20. ‘ἔννεοι, ‘dumb,’ and, by implication, ‘senseless.’

—ἀκούοντες μὲν τῆς φωνῆς] This seems at variance with the account at xxii. 9, τὸ μὲν φῶς ἐθεάσαντο, τὴν δὲ φωνὴν οὐκ ἤκουσαν τοῦ λαλοῦντός μοι. Of the various modes of removing the discrepancy, the most satisfactory one is to take ἤκουσαν (with Grot., Valcknaer, Dobree, and Kuin.), in the sense ‘understood,’ a signification of the word often occurring in the New Test. and Sept. (as Gen. xi. 7), and sometimes in the Class. writers. They heard the sound of the voice which addressed Saul, but did not, it seems, fully understand the sense of what they heard; either from imperfect acquaintance with the Hebrew language, or, rather, because the words would not to them carry their meaning so plainly, as they did to the conscience-stricken Saul.

8. οὐδένα ἔβλεπε [‘saw no one’—neither Jesus, whom he opened his eyes to see, nor even his companions; as much as to say, he was blind. That on rising and opening his eyes he had lost the power of seeing any one, whether Jesus or his companions, is also clear from xxii. 11, ὡς δὲ οὐκ ἐνίβλεπον ἀπὸ τῆς δόξης τοῦ φωτός ἐκείνου. On the continued blindness of Saul, the above Commentators again exert themselves to exclude all supernatural agency; but in vain. To suppose merely the existence of a temporary amaurosis, induced by excess of light, involves endless and insuperable difficulties. For, 1. How is it consistent with what we read further on,—that scales had grown over the eyes? 2. This amaurosis is, as they themselves admit, an affection which lasts but a very short time; whereas Saul's blindness continued about three days. 3. How are we to account for a blindness so complete, as to be accompanied with scales over the eyes, leaving Saul so soon,—nay, immediately on Ananias's laying his hands on him? 4. How is it that Saul alone, and none of his companions, was struck with this amaurosis?

It should seem that in the case of Saul, as in that of Elymas, the blindness was not only judicial, but typical and emblematical. In the former case it was probably meant, by withdrawing his attention from external thoughts, and turning them inward, to favour reflection and self-examination, and thus to lead to repentance.

— οὐδὲνα ἴδ[ε]ν. Lachm. and Tisch. edit, from MSS. A, B, and the Vulg. and Syriac, οὐδὲν. But I would still retain, with Griesb. and Alf., οὐδὲνα, on account of the vast preponderance of external authority, confirmed by internal evidence; considering that οὐδὲνα is undoubtedly the more difficult reading; and οὐδὲν seems to have arisen either from critical alteration, to render, Alford thinks, the description of the blindness more complete, or from a marginal Scolium proceeding from some philologist who, very properly, viewed the phrase as a popular form of expression to denote 'total blindness,' equivalent to μὴ βλέπειν. at v. 9, οὐκ ἐνέβλεπον at xxii. 11. In such a case the authority of Versions is next to nothing. And here internal evidence is the stronger, considering that the external authority for οὐδὲν is singularly weak, being confined to the Alex. MS.; for as to the Vatic. MS. B, which Tisch. adds, he had only the authority of one out of the three collations. And since it is found in only one MS. for certain, it might arise solely from an error of the scribes (such errors abound in that MS.), by confounding the marks of abbreviation, to indicate the terminations -εν and -ενα, which are very similar.

— χειραγωγούντες δέ: Several MSS., two Versions, some Fathers, and early Editions, have χειραγ. τε, which has been received into the text by Matthæi and Scholz; but injudiciously; for it has the appearance of being a mere marginal gloss of those who supposed the δὲ to be put for τε, which was afterwards adopted by those fastidious Critics, who objected to three δὲ's in succession. In truth, the δὲ is not here put for τε (it never really is), but is exegetical, serving for explanation or illustration, as at Mark iv. 37, καὶ γίνεται λαλῆσαι ἀνίκου μεγάλην· τὰ δὲ κύματα ἐπιβάλλε, &c., and xvi. 8, εἶχε δὲ αὐτὰς τρόμον. In fact, it is used nearly as in certain passages of the Scriptural and Class. writers, where δὲ is said to be put for γάρ. Accordingly the purport of χειραγ. δὲ here may be thus expressed: 'He was indeed stone-blind, so that they had to lead him by the hand to Damascus.' The circumstance of their thus leading him is, like that infra xiii. 11, introduced by way of showing his utter blindness. So Artemid. Oneir. v. 2,

9. ἡμέρας τρεῖς]. We need not understand 'three complete days,' but may suppose that among these 'three days' are to be reckoned that on which Saul reached Damascus, and that on which Ananias came to him and removed his blindness. Thus when it is said that Christ was in the sepulchre 'three days,' we know it was, in fact, but one whole day and part of two others.

— οὐκ ἔφαγεν οὐδὲ ἔπιεν]. We might, in any other case, understand this of extreme abstinence. But to suppose it here (with several recent Commentators) were an unwarrantable licence of interpretation; as, indeed, in most of the passages to which they appeal as examples of this hyperbole, as they term it. Complete fasting was very suitable for one under Saul's present awful visitation, which he could not know would ever be removed. Indeed the terror and remorse he felt, and the total absorption of his mind on a new and momentous subject, with the exercise of self-examination and earnest prayer for mercy and pardon, would leave him no inclination to eat and drink for the time mentioned, even had not his body been too disordered to admit of it. See Calvin.

11, 12. I still retain the same punctuation (according to which v. 12 ought to have commenced at ἰδοὺ γάρ, &c., as is the case in the Catena Oxon. edited by Cramer), which punctuation I find confirmed by the ancient Versions, and the most ancient MSS., and Chrys.; also by De Lyra, who points thus: 'Tharsensem; ecce enim orat et vidit.' The common punctuation crept in from the Complut., Eras., and R. Steph., and was inadvertently continued by all the Editors down to Griesb., who was the first to restore the ancient and true punctuation, which is certainly required by the context, as was seen by Calv., Hamm., Dodd., Wesley, A. Clarke, and Halles. It only remains to observe, that the common punctuation led to the false interpretation propounded by Matth. Henry and others, according to which the words γάρ προσεύχεται (taken absolutely) are supposed to intimate, that though Saul, as a Pharisee, had often said his prayers, yet he had never prayed them till now. But it cannot be doubted that, as Saul, while a Pharisee, had, as he testifies of himself, 'lived in all good conscience towards God,' so, from his ardent temperament and warm zeal (though 'not according to knowledge'), he had made many fervent prayers. On the other hand, if the words be taken (as they ought) in connexion with the subsequent ones, and rendered (as propriety of language demands), 'for, behold, he is praying,' i. e. 'engaged in prayer,' a most suitable sense will be introduced; for the circumstance of his being engaged in prayer, and having seen a preternatural vision, was a strong reason why Ananias should speedily go and fulfil what that vision had intimated to Saul. Of course, προσεύχεται is to be taken in its fullest sense, as denoting 'a complete elevation . . . of the mind to God, and a pouring out of the whole heart and soul to him, who knoweth the heart.' See De Lyra, and T. Aquin., in the passages referred to in the Index Generalis to his works, Edit. Venet. vol. xxviii. So, too, Calvin, after explaining προσεύχεται by precibus suis intentus, ably remarks; 'Christus certe non de precatione momenti unius hic agit, sed potius indicat Paulum in hoc genere exercitii fuisse assiduum, donec quieto et composito animo daretur. Nec dubium est quin mire ejus animum cruciaverit anxia plenæ revelationis expectatio: ac Domino hæc ratio fuit cur illum triduo differret, ut precandi ardorem magis in eo accenderet.' The circumstances of the case will not permit us to doubt that the prayer was for pardon to that God, whose Son he had ignorantly persecuted while persecuting his disciples, and for grace to direct his steps into the right course in future; which seems implied in the words at v. 7, λαληθήσεται σοι ὅ τι σε δεῖ ποιεῖν. He did not, we may suppose, so much pray for the removal of his blindness,—which he considered as a just judgment on his obstinate shutting of his eyes to the light from on high,—as for pardon of his sin (which would, of itself, remove the infliction), and grace to direct his steps aright; and, accordingly, one main purport of his prayers must have been, that some one might, by the Providence of God, be sent to direct him. In answer to this prayer, the vision was vouchsafed to him; which, while it held out to him the removal of his blindness, held out also a just hope of a Director as well as a Healer in the person signified to him, by some mode of intimation of which we are not informed, as by name Ananias.

14. ἴδε [in this place.] As Heb. xiii. 14. — ἔχει ἐξουσίαν παρὰ τῶν ἀρχιερέων, &c.] How this came to the knowledge of Ananias, we are left to conjecture; and the thing has been accounted for in various ways by different Commentators. Wolf and Rosenmuller suppose Ananias to have received letters from Jerusalem, apprising him of the mischief which was brewing up. Yet counsels, such as these are usually kept secret; and little probable is it that the Christians would be acquainted with it in time to apprise the Damascene Christians of their danger; for we find there was so little connexion between the cities, that the intelligence of Saul's conversion was a very long time in reaching them. It may rather be supposed that the design of Saul's journey to Damascus was divulged by his companions, and thus came to the ears of the Christians. And Ananias might justly doubt whether so bitter an enemy to Christianity could have so suddenly changed, and become disposed to receive that doctrine.

15. σκευὸς ἐκλογῆς] A Hebraism for σκ. ἐλεκτόν, a chosen instrument to accomplish the Divine purposes.

— βαστάσαι] 'to carry forth' [and promote those purposes].

16. It is not expressly said that Ananias should lay hands upon Saul; but that was implied, and Ananias could not but perceive that the affair was to take place in coincidence with the vision. Hence he tells Saul that the Lord had sent him for that purpose. The words were spoken to encourage Ananias. And the assurance that Paul would suffer, &c., for the Lord, was also a prediction, the fulfilment of which appears from xx. 23, 25, et al.

17. ὅπως—πλησθῇς Πν. ἁγ.] Jesus had not, indeed, told Ananias this; but he well knew it was impossible that Saul could be able to effect what he was to effect, without a copious effusion of the Holy Spirit, as implied in πλησθῇς.

18. εὐθέως ἀπίστεον—λαπίδες] In vain is it to attempt (as some have done) to account for this on natural principles. Nothing can be plainer than that St. Luke means to represent the removal of the blindness, as he had done the infliction of it, as supernatural. It may be very true that there is a disorder of the eye, sometimes occurring in the East, called λευκωμα, produced by certain humours in the eye, which, becoming concrete, form, as it were, scales. See Foca. (Econ. Hippocr. But this is admitted to be a disorder which comes on very gradually; whereas the phenomenon in question having been sudden, and without any natural cause, must be regarded as miraculous.

19. ὁ Σαῦλος] These words, not found in very many MSS., have been cancelled by almost all Editors.

— ἡμέρας τινάς] Meaning, not certain days, but some days. On the chronological difficulty supposed to be involved in this and the following verses, see note on Gal. i. 17.

20. ἐκήρυξεν, &c.] On further and more mature consideration, I am of opinion that Matthew's defence of the reading Χριστόν, which proceeds on the ground that Χριστός is to be taken as standing for Ἰησοῦς, is unsatisfactory, as taking for granted, what has not been proved, that Χριστός was ever so used;—and the above view is, moreover, opposed by the τόν. Again: to take τόν Χρ. in its only provable sense, 'the anointed Messiah' (as observes Mr. Green, Gr. N. T. p. 178) involves an absurdity; for to prove to Jews that the expected Messiah was the Son of God was as little necessary as it was highly essential to maintain that Jesus was that Divine person.

21. πορθήσας] Properly a military term, often used by the Historians, signifying 'to ravage, devastate, a country.' So, too, in the Poets; but here figur. 'to vex by persecution.' Thus it is at Gal. i. 13, joined with διώκειν.

22. συμβιβάζων] 'evincing,' 'proving;' as in 1 Cor. ii. 16. Συμβιβάζειν prop. signifies 'to put together, as carpenters' work.' And since he who proves any thing, does it by putting together, showing the connexion, and tracing the chain of facts or reasonings, so it comes to mean 'to demonstrate,' a sense which occurs in the above passage of 1 Cor., and sometimes in the Sept., and the Greek Class. writers, as Plato, Aristot., and Ocell. Luc.

24. ἐγκώσθη—αὐτῶν] This clause, from its disturbing the construction, was removed in the Syr. Version, and by Wakef., and placed after παρετήρουν—ἀνέλωσι. But, rather than suppose so very harsh a transposition, I would regard the clause, with Abp. Newcome, as parenthetical.

Yet thus παρετήρουν will be brought into the closest connexion with οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι as its Nominative. And the statement will run counter to that in 2 Cor. xi. 32, where St. Paul says not that the Jews, but that the soldiers of the Ethnarch of King Aretas occupied the gates, that he might not escape. Some Commentators, indeed (as Kuin.), attempt to remove this discrepancy by supposing, either that the Jews may be said to have done what they did, by another, they having suggested the thing; or that the Jews, by the authority of the Ethnarch, watched the gates in conjunction with the soldiers. Of these two solutions, the second is preferable. I am now inclined to read, with Lachm. and Tisch., from 5 uncial and several cursive MSS., παρετήρουντο, for reasons which will appear from what is said in the note on Luke vi. 7. Mark iii. 2.

25. καθῆκαν διὰ τοῦ τείχους] Doddr. and Wakef. translate, 'by the side of the wall,' which is confirmed by Athen. i. 214, διὰ τῶν τειχῶν αὐτοὺς καθήμενους. Yet from a comparison with the parallel passage at 2 Cor. xi. 33, καὶ διὰ θυρίδος, it should seem that διὰ must here mean διὰ θυρίδος, i.e. 'by an aperture in.' So Luke v. 19, διὰ τῶν κεράμων καθῆκαν ἐντὺς. Palaph. de Incred. 9, καθεῖς ἐαυτὸν διὰ θυρίδος. Aristoph. Vesp. 379, ἐξάντα διὰ τῆς θυρίδος τὸ καλῶδες, εἰτα καθίμι Δέσας αὐτάς, 1 Sam. xii. 12, κατάγει ἡ Μ. τὸν Δαβὶδ διὰ τῆς θυρίδος. By the θυρίδος, however, thus supposed alluded to, we are not to understand a window in the wall itself (for the exceedingly thick city walls of the ancients scarcely admitted of windows), but in some turret on the wall, or perhaps a window of some house which was connected in some way with the wall. For that this was sometimes the case, is clear from Thucyd. ii. 4, and the passages of the Classical writers cited by me in the note there. Mr. Alf., indeed, understands it of a window in the city wall, and says that such windows in a city wall were customary in the East; alleging in proof Josh. ii. 15. But there the sense is not quite certain; but it seems to be, as in our Authorized Version, confirmed by the Syr. Vera, and the Chaldee Paraph. 'ON the wall' (comp. Lev. x. 10, 'adificia juncta muro'), a custom perhaps peculiar to the East. See my note on Thucyd. ii. 4. As to the engraving to which Mr. Alf. refers in Conybeare's and Howson's Life of St. Paul, vol. i. p. 100, of part of the present wall of Damascus, that supplies no proof as to the ancient wall in the time of St. Paul. Comp. a Rabbinical writer cited by Weta. on 2 Cor. xi. 33, 'Domus in paenibus constructa, cujus paries exterior est murus urbis'; where for in, render super, as the γ of the Original requires; for that γ has that sense in Hebrew no one would deny.

²⁶ παραγενόμενος—in [Ier.] Not immediately, but after having gone (for the second time, it should seem) into Arabia. See note on Gal. i. 17. This circumstance Luke omits, because he only meant to narrate such parts of St. Paul's history, and more public ministrations, as especially illustrated the providence of God over him, and the mode in which he was brought to devote himself to the conversion of the Gentiles.

—μὴ πιστεύοντες ὅτι ἐστὶ μαθ.] Render: 'distrusting (equiv. to 'not firmly believing') that he was a disciple.' Pure Grecism would have required οὐ πιστ. (which we find in Demosth. 366, 1. 867, 21, and Hdtian. ii. 1, 23, Lucian, i. 756, and in New Test. Matt. xxi. 25, 32. Luke xx. 5. John iii. 12, et al. sap.), for while οὐ expresses the direct and full negative, absolutely and objectively; μὴ expresses it conditionally and subjectively; serving to imply that we conceive, or suppose, a thing not to exist; while οὐ implies that it actually does not exist.

—[Ἑλλησ.] On the Ἑλλησιστ. see supra vi. 1, note. These foreign Jews, sojourning at Jerusalem, would be as much opposed to the doctrine,—that Jesus was the Christ,—as the pure Jews themselves residing in Jerusalem, and sought to compass their end by the very same atrocity.

³⁰ κατήγαγον] 'conducted him down;' said, perhaps, with reference to the situation of Caesarea (by which we are to understand not, as Doddr., Olsh., and others suppose, Caesarea-Philippi, but Caesarea in Palestine, which is always meant when the name occurs without any addition); that being on the sea-coast, and accordingly low, compared with the upland region of Damascus. Yet I now prefer to take the κατὰ as merely used in the sense 'through,' or 'throughout,' 'along,' as often in κατὰ τὴν ὁδόν, without any reference, high or low, to the places; as in Thucyd. iv. 78, οἱ ἀγωγοὶ κατέστησαν αὐτὸν ἐν Δίῳ, where I have adduced examples of the use from Hom., Xen., Dion. Hal., Plut., Jambli., and Joseph.; also infra xvii. 15, καθίσταντες—ἡγαγον αὐτὸν ἕως Ἀθηνῶν. I quite agree with Mr. Alford that ἐξαπείσταιλαν looks more like a 'sending off' by sea, than a mere 'sending forward' by land. Ἐξαποστ. is, indeed, a word of rather unfrequent occurrence; yet it is used more than once of 'sending out by sea.' So Demosth., p. 251, 5, ἐξαπεστάλη—τὰ πλοῖα. Diod. Sic. xx. 52, ναὺς ἐξαποστ. v. 84, ἀποκίνας ἐξαπ. ἐκ τῆς Κρήτης. And though Mr. Alford points at a discrepancy in Paul's own account, Gal. i. 21, from which it would appear that he traversed Syria in his way to Tarsus. But this he might do, and yet go by sea from Caesarea. It is plain that Paul's friends did not think it safe to send him from Damascus to Tarsus by land, doubtless from apprehension of the 'perils from robbers.' Besides, the course by which they did send him was both the safer, and the more commodious one to Tarsus,—namely, by land to Caesarea, and then by sea to Seleucia, and finally by land from Seleucia and Antioch to Tarsus. But if this was Saul's route,—as Luke probably learnt from Paul,—then there is no discrepancy; for he did traverse many parts of Syria and of Cilicia, as far as was necessary to bring him to Tarsus. It was unnecessary for Paul to mention his sea-voyage to the Galatians. It may seem strange that the Christian brethren did not send him to the port of Sidon, in Syria, only a fourth of the distance to Cæsarea. That they did not do so must have been occasioned by particular reasons; probably the circumstance that there were not a few brethren at Cæsarea who would receive Paul very kindly, and contrive a passage for him by sea to Seleucia.

31. This verse describes the state of the Church in Palestine at this period as one of peaceful tranquillity, as opposed to the turmoil of persecution, or the fear of it.

In οἰκοδομοῦμεναι we have an architectural metaphor; though some difference of opinion exists as to whether it should be taken in the physical sense, of increase in number of persons, or, in a moral sense, of increase in spiritual knowledge and the grace of God; and so it is generally used in St. Paul's Epistles. The former view is mostly adopted by the earlier Commentators, while recent ones, with reason, prefer the latter; which is supported by numerous passages of the New Test. But it refers to both; for, as Calvin observes, 'vel pro Incrementis accipi potest, dum scilicet augeantur Ecclesie numero fidelium, vel pro eorum, qui jam in grege sunt, profectu, dum scilicet cumulantur novis donis et majorem pietatis confirmationem accipiunt.' He then adds that he would comprehend both. When applied to Christian communities, the expression has usually reference to the promotion of peace, order, and unity in the Church, and the establishing and strengthening, by the exercise of perfect charity, that household of God, which is built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets; Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone, Eph. ii. 20. Here, however, it should seem mainly to refer to the individuals composing each of the Churches respectively,—namely (as Calv. explains), 'from their receiving new gifts and a greater confirmation of piety.' Of course implying, together with increase in grace and spiritual knowledge, a corresponding progress in Christian practice, which seems intimated by the foregoing πορευόμεναι τῷ φόβῳ τοῦ Κυρίου; by walking being meant habitual manner of life and conversation. The more regular construction would have been: καὶ οἰκοδομοῦντο, πορευόμεναι τῷ φόβῳ τοῦ Κυρίου, καὶ τῇ παρακλήσει τοῦ ἁγίου Πνεύματος πληθύνοντες. Many, indeed, refer the words τῇ παρακλήσει τοῦ ἁγίου Πνεύματος, as well as τῷ φόβῳ τοῦ Κυρίου, to πορευόμεναι; and consequently take ἐπληθύνοντο simply of increase in numbers; as Acts vi. 1. But this supposes a most harsh construction. It is more natural to refer the words to the following ἐπληθύνοντο, which will then yield the far better sense of abounding,—i. e. in the grace of the Holy Spirit; as at Matt. xxiv. 12. Acts xii. 24. 1 Pet. i. 2, χάρις ὑμῖν πληθυνθεῖη,—for, as Calv. observes, 'Duo (ista quæ sequuntur) Ambuisse in timore Domini, et Spiritus consolatione fuisse repletos, edificationis illius sunt partea. Conf. 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17.' But to advert to a matter of Criticism, as respects the true text of the passage;—παρακλήσει does not mean 'exhortation,' as Alford explains, since the reading of the Vulg. and Syrr., consolatione, is a just rendering, so that it be taken for consolatione,—as pointing at the spiritual aid of the Comforter, in the full sense of ὁ Παράκλητος in John xiv. 26, where see note.

For αἱ ἐκκλησίαι—εἶχον, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit ἡ ἐκκλησία—εἶχεν, expressing also the words following in the singular. But the authority for this change, that of three uncials and a few cursive MSS. (to which I can add nothing), though confirmed by the Syriac and Vulg. Versions, is insufficient; and hence I have, with Griesb. and Scholz, retained the text. rec. Mr. Alford here had better have followed his usual guide, Meyer, who is of opinion that the reading ἐκκλησία was 'an alteration to suit the idea of the unity of the Church;' although, in point of fact, it seems to have been a mere alteration of Critica, who thought the general notion of Church presented the idea in a more distinct form than is done by so many plurals throughout the verse, which a Classical writer would have avoided. Alford thinks the text. rec. was an alteration to suit the plurals at xv. 45, and xvi. 5. But that could not be, unless the Critics were blockheads; since in those passages the plurals are used of congregations, first singly visited and confirmed by Paul and Barnabas, and which are then spoken of conjointly, and therefore the singular could not have been excogitated, and does not exist in any copy; which completely oversets Alford's argument against Meyer. I have said 'a few cursives,' since they do not amount to more than twelve; for as to Scholz's alii multi, they are mere umbræ inanes. As to the authority of ancient Versions and Fathers; the latter have very little weight, and the former not much, considering that they might, as in a multitude of other passages, prefer a free to a literal version.

32. From this verse to chap. xi. 18, are related the journeys undertaken by Peter (who had hitherto confined his Evangelical labours to Jerusalem, with the exception of a short visit to Samaria, related at viii. 14), for the purpose of visiting and confirming the churches founded in Palestine, and, by his preaching, increasing the numbers of their members.

32. διὰ πάντων] scil. τῶν ἁγίων. Meaning, the congregations thereof. For text. rec. Ἀσόδαν I have received Ἀσόδα, with Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., with A, B, and a few cursives, but rather more than the Editors adduce; to which I add Lamb. 1196; and such was, I think, the reading of the original of the Leicester MS., as far as the indistinctness of the present reading can show. That such must have been the reading πρὸς τοὺς ἁγίους τοὺς κατοικοῦντας * Λύδδα. ³³ Εὗρε δὲ ἐκεῖ ἄνθρωπόν τινα Αἰνέαν ὀνόματι, ἐξ ἐτῶν ὀκτὼ κατακείμενον ἐπὶ κρᾶββάτῳ, ὃς ἦν παραλελυμένος. ³⁴ Καὶ εἶπεν αὐτῷ ὁ Πέτρος· Αἰνέα· ὁ ἰαταί σε Ἰησοῦς ὁ Χριστός· ἀνάστηθι καὶ στρώσον σεαυτῷ. of the copy used by the Pesch. Syr. Translators is certain, since they write ἡ, the Hebrew name, perhaps having in their original Λοδ, found in the Sept., 1 Chron. viii. 12. Joseph, too (Bell. ii. 19, 1), has the form Λύδδα, formed on the Syro-Chald. לוד. It is true that Joseph. uses the inflected form at xx. 6, 2, κόμην τινὰ Λύδδαν λεγομένην. But, since elsewhere he uses the uninflected form, formed no doubt on the Lüdd of his Hebrew first edit., so he would be likely to use it here; but I suspect that the N arose from the A following. To show the carelessness of some Critical Editors, Griesb. omits all mention of the reading; while Scholz omits to notice the Alex. MS. both here and at v. 35, and only reports one curative. From the name, Aeneas seems to have been an Hellenist; and, as the air of the passage—Peter's visit being to the saints—would suggest, a Christian.

worked, and also the whole of the territory in which Lydda was situated, called Saron, which is a long strip of plain, extending along the sea-coast from Caesarea to Joppa (on which see Robinson's Bibl. Res. iii. 31), and which had been previously partly evangelized by Philip; see supra viii. 40. The above is the view taken by Robins. and Alf., which may be the true one. But it is liable to the strong objection,—that Lydda itself was not within the plain of Saron, but south of it; and hence, after all, Σαρ. may represent a village in the immediate vicinity of Lydda, perhaps the Saren mentioned by Mariti, Travels, p. 350, as situated between Lydda and Arsuf (perhaps the Sariphæa of Arrowsmith). And that recent travellers (observe Alf.) do not mention it, is no proof of the non-existence of the village. If Saren does exist, it must represent the Saron of Luke, and have been situated in the immediate vicinity of Lydda, two or three miles N.W. of it.

—λούσαντες δὲ αὐτήν] As it cannot be supposed that wen would perform such an office (though there are passages in Herodotus which prove that it was in Egypt customarily performed by men), we may, with Pearce and Markland, take λούσαντες as put for λούσσαι, by reference to ἀνθρώποις understood, that being a general term, and including females. That women are here meant, there is the more reason to think, since we learn both from the Scriptural and ancient writers in general, that women were employed on such offices, even towards men. So Ennius, cited by Wetstein, 'Tarquinii corpus bona femina lavit et unxit.' And Socrates (as we learn from Plato, Phæd.) chose to take a bath just before he drank the fatal cup, ὥστε μὴ πράγματα ταῖς γυναῖξιν παρέχων. Accordingly we cannot doubt that women always performed such offices to women. This is, indeed, proved by a passage of Apuleius (cited by Pricæus and Wetstein), 'Familiæres miseræ Charites accuratissimè corpus ablutum, unità sepulchrâ, ibidem marito perpetuam conjugem reddidera.'

39. ἐπιδεικνύμεναι.—Δορκάς] The sense is: 'Showing coats and garments such as Dorcas used to make when she was with them.' The use of the Imperfect to denote custom is not unfrequent. It is not certain whether the garments shown were, as the common opinion is, stocks of clothes provided for the poor; or (which is the opinion of several recent Commentators, and some of the ancients), such garments as the widows then had on. The latter, however, seems countenanced neither by the words themselves (for thus the Article would be requisite at χιτῶνας and ἱμάτια; and ἃ, not ὅσα, would have been used), nor by the air of the context; not to say that there is something not a little jejune in the latter view, while the former is perfectly natural and appropriate. The widows meant to justify, as it were, their grief, by showing Peter how industriously active Tabitha had been in her domestic duties, and how much she would be missed. With the simplicity and pathos of the expression μετ' αὐτῶν οὕσα we may compare something similar in the beautiful passages of Eurip. Alc. 901, φίλα μιν δὲ ἦν γὰρ μετ' ἡμῶν, and Heracl. 9, δὲ ἦν μετ' ἡμῶν.

40. ἐκβαλὼν ἔξω] See note on Matt. ix. 25, and compare 2 Kings iv. 33.

41. παρέστησεν αὐτὴν ζῶσαν] 'Vivam praeſtabat;' so Sext. Emp. 254, ὅτε Ἀδμήτωρ ὁ Ἑρακλῆς τὴν Ἀλκестιν γῆθεν ἀναγαγὼν παρέστησε. Comp. 1 Kings xvii. 23.

X. 1. Hitherto the Gospel had been preached to the Jews only, who supposed that salvation was to be restricted to their own nation alone. Accordingly none had been, thus far, admitted by baptism into the Christian Church, but Jews and Samaritans,—or at least Jewish proselytes, all of them circumcised persons, and bound to observe the Ceremonial law; though of late it had begun to be seen by some, as Stephen, that the Gospel was to be one of uncircumcision. But the time had now come, when it pleased God that the Gentiles should be openly called to share the privileges of the people of God, without being proselyted to Judaism, either before or after their conversion to Christianity. In order, however, to meet the prejudices of the Jewish converts, it was, by a Divine pre-arrangement, ordained that the person with whom the change commenced, should be, though uncircumcised, and a Gentile, a worshipper of the one true God. Thus the imminent peril of a permanent schism in the infant Church was by Divine Providence averted. Accordingly, as is well observed by Neander, 'the pernicious influence with which, from the first, the self-seeking and one-sided prejudices of human nature threatened the Divine work, was counteracted by the superior influence of the Holy Spirit, which did not allow the differences of men to reach such a point of antagonism, but enabled them to retain unity in variety. We recognize the preventing wisdom of God,—which, while giving scope to the free agency of man, knows how to interpose his immediate revelation just at the moment when it is requisite for the success of the Divine work,—by noticing that when the Apostles needed this wider development of their Christian knowledge for the exercise of their vocation, and when the lack of it would have been exceedingly detrimental,—at that very moment, by a remarkable coincidence of inward revelation with a chain of outward circumstances, the illumination hitherto wanting was imparted to them.'

—σπεῖρης τ. κ. Ἰ.] meaning a cohort similar to the Praetorian cohorts of the Roman emperors, but not a legionary one, but forming the body-guard in attendance on the President of Syria, and garrisoning Caesarea. It was called Italiana, as being formed chiefly of Italians, in contradistinction to others raised from the provinciales, such as were most of the corps in Syria and Palestine. Of this corps mention is made by Arrian, Tact. p. 73 (cited by Wetst.), προστάχθησαν δὲ αὐτῶν οἱ τῆς σπεῖρης Ἰταλικῆς πεζοί, whence it appears that the cohort consisted both of infantry and cavalry. Whether the cohortes milium Italicoe voluntariae quae est in Syria, mentioned in Gruter, Inscr. i. p. 434, quoted by Mr. Humphrey, was the corps in question is doubtful, since the age of the Inscription is uncertain.

2. εὐσεβὴς καὶ φοβ. —Θεόν] These words only attest that Cornelius was a worshipper of the one true God. Whether he was a Proselyte of the Gate or not, is indeed uncertain. But I am still of opinion that he was; and Mr. Alf. acknowledges that 'there is nothing in the narrative to preclude it.' But surely there are circumstances in the narrative which seem to point at it, inasmuch as μαρτυροῦμενος πρὸς ὅλον τὸν

ἔθνων τῶν Ἰουδαίων could never have been said of a Gentile who had made no approach to Jewish faith and worship, which the Proselytes of the Gate did; those were, we know, held in consideration by the Jews. Hence Cornelius was a proper person,—being so much of a Gentile, and also so much of a Jew,—to form the connecting link between both. Indeed, Mr. Alf. thinks that many such cases of Jewish Proselytes admitted by baptism into the Church had occurred. I would rather say, that ‘some such cases may have occurred.’ And I agree with Mr. Alf., that the object of this Providential interference seems to have been, to give a solemn sanction to such reception by the agency of him who was both the chief of the Apostles, and the strong upholder of pure Judaism.

—δοῦναι τοῦ Θεοῦ] A peculiar construction, found no where else in the New Test., and in the Sept. only once, in Dan. vi. 11, δοῦναι τοῦ Θεοῦ, which seems to have been in Luke’s mind. The construction, indeed, occurs supra viii. 22, but followed by εἰ ἄρα. Were it not for the phrase at next verse being interchanged with πρὸς τὸν Θεόν, I should have supposed that ἀπὸ was to be understood there, and perhaps here, denoting the asking of God in prayer some object of petition. Be that as it may, I agree with Neander, that the subject of Cornelius’ prayer was [mainly] that he might be guided into the truth; i. e. into the true way of serving God acceptably, and undoubtedly with reference to the religion of Jesus, now spreading so far and wide.

3. εἶδεν ἐν ὁράματι, &c.] The terms here employed, εἶδεν and φανερῶς, as also the hour of the day when this circumstance took place, and the religious duty in which Cornelius was engaged,—all preclude the notion of certain continental Critics, who would resolve the whole into natural causes, and suppose that Cornelius was asleep, and that the whole took place merely in vision. It was plainly a real angelic appearance (such as that to Zecharias, Luke i. 11), and the ὄραμα a real spectacle and supernatural representation, like several others recorded in this book.

4. τί ἐστι, κύριε ;] ‘What is it, Sir?’ A popular form of respectful answer to the call of a superior, though sometimes to that of an inferior, varying according to the tone of voice with which it is pronounced. Kuinoel aptly cites Esth. v. 1, τί ἐστιν, Ἐσθήρ; Thus there is an ellipse of some such words as αἰτημά σου, which is supplied at Esth. vii. 2.

—ἀνέβησαν—ἐνώπιον τοῦ Θεοῦ] Merely an Oriental and figurative way of expressing that any thing has come to the knowledge of God; not necessarily implying the Jewish notion, that men’s prayers are carried up by angels to God in heaven. In eis memm. (for ἵστα μνησθῆναι, ‘to remember for approbation’) we have the Hellenistic use of μνημόσυνον for μνημεῖον, corresponding to the Hebr. מִנְחָה. Comp. Rev. viii. 4.

6. ξενίζεται] for ξενοδοχεῖται. See my Lex.

—βυρσεῖ] The Attic writers used βυρσοδέψης, literally a skin-softerner, corresponding to our currier. With them βυρσεῖς only denoted a skinner, though there can be little doubt that, among the ancients, the two trades were often conjoined, as far as the rougher sorts of tanning were concerned; and both were proverbially mean occupations, and held in such contempt by the Jews as almost unclean, that various laws were in force regulating the exercise thereof. See my Rec. Syn. Thus the house being by the sea-side (i. e. as opposed to the harbour, and consequently out of the city) was in conformity to a law which obliged tanners to have their workshops outside of towns. So Artemid. i. 53, νεκρῶν ἀπὸ τῶν σωματῶν ὁ βυρσοδέψης, καὶ τῆς πόλεως ἀπώκισται. Surenhus. Mich. T. iv. p. 64, ‘Cadavera et sepulcra separat, et coriarium l. cubitos a civitate.’ Curriers were always placed near rivers, or by the sea, for the convenience of water, indispensable for their trade.

—οὗτος—ποιεῖν] These words are absent from many of the best MSS. [including all the Lamb. and Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B. x.], Versions, and Fathers; and are written so very differently in others, that almost all Critics and Editors are, with reason, agreed that they are from the margin, introduced from ix. 6. xi. 14. xxii. 10.

7. τῶν προσκαρτ. α.] Pricæus, Schleus., and Kuin. take προσκαρτ. to mean ‘of those who stood sentry at his gate.’ But there is perhaps no sufficient reason to abandon the common version, ‘of those who waited upon him,’— εφγμένον, καὶ καταβαίνειν ἐπ' αὐτὸν σκεῦός τι, ὡς ὁθόνην μεγάλην, τέσσαρσιν ἀρχαῖς δεδεμένον, καὶ καθιέμενον ἐπὶ τῆς namely, as domestic; for it seems that centurions were allowed to use some of their soldiers in that capacity. This sense is confirmed by the use of the word supra viii. 13, and is perhaps required by the ἐκείνων at ver. 10, where see note.

9. τὸ δῶμα] 'the flat roof.' The usual situation chosen by pious persons to perform their devotions. So Tannith, fol. 23, 'ascendamus in tectum, et imploremus misericordiam.' And Beracoth, p. 34, 'conscendit superius comaculum, Deumque per se oravit.' That the custom was not confined to the Jews, but extended to the Gentiles, appears from Zeph. i. 5, and Strab.
 Geogr. xvi. 3, 20, ἡλίον τιμῶσιν ἐπὶ τοῦ δώματος, ἰδρυσάμενοι βωμόν, σπίνδοντες αὐτῷ.

10. πρόσπεινος] A word occurring nowhere else; though κατάπεινος, ἱκπεινος, and δξύ-πεινος are found.

— ἤθελε γεύσασθαι.] Supply τροφῆς or such like, which is sometimes expressed. This absolute use of the word (also found infra xx.
 11) is rare; but occurs also in Jon. iii. 7. Jos.
 Antt. vi. 14, 3. The expression signifies to make a meal, without reference to the quantity of food taken. See my note on Thucyd.
 ii. 70.

— ἐκείνων] Four uncial and a few cursive
 MSS. [to which I add Lamb. 1185, Mus. 16, 184, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16], and Origen have αὐ-τῶν, which seems to have greater propriety; but it is perhaps an emendation, espec. as it comes from a quarter fruitful in such. Hence it ought to have been adopted into the text by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.

— ἐκστασις] Render, 'an ecstasy,' or 'trance.'
 The word properly signifies a removal of any thing from any former situation, or state; but it is here applied to that removal of the mind from the body by which, even though awake, we are insensible to external objects, and our senses are so far from conveying to us the impressions of those objects, that the mind seems, as it were, to have retired from the body, and to be wholly absorbed in the contemplation of internal and mental images; with which it is so fully engrossed, that it regards them as absolute realities and matters of fact. I agree with Alford, that the distinction of this appearance from the δραμα above is, that in this case what was seen was a revelation shown to the eye of the beholder when rapt into a supernatural state, having, as in the case of a dream, no objective reality; whereas in the other the thing seen actually happened, and was beheld by the person as an ordinary spectator.

11. σκεῦός] The word here denotes 'a hollow vessel,' of a cup form, for containing any thing; as infra 16. xi. 5. John xix. 29, Sept., = 72, 2 Kings iv. 3. Hecian. iv. 7, 8.—Ὁθὼν here means such a sheet as is used to hold any thing wrapped in it.

— ἀρχαῖς] In order to determine the exact sense of this controverted term, it may be proper to premise that the word properly signifies the extremity of any thing of an oblong form, each end thus being considered as a beginning. See Galen. ap. Rec. Syn. And, as in things of the form of a parallelogram (as in a web of cloth), each end, having two angles, may be said to have two of these ἀρχαί; thus ἀρχαί might here be rendered extremities, or corners; though 'ends' is the more accurate version. Wakef., indeed, renders 'by four strings,' referring, for an example of that signification, to Galen, de Chirur.
 ii. Exod. xxviii. 23. Diod. Sic. i. 109, ἀρχὴ σχοινοῦ. Lucian iii. 83, δεσμῶν ἀρχαί. Hdt.
 iv. 60, τὴν ἀρχὴν τοῦ στρόφου. Eurip. Hipp.
 772, πλεκτὰς πεισμάτων ἀρχαί. But the first and second passages only prove that either or both ends of any oblong body may be called ἀρχαί. The rest show that it was not unfre-quently used of the end of a rope or band. So far, the proof only amounts to this,—that ἀρχή may denote the end of any thing, and, with the addition of a word signifying band, the end of a rope; but there is no proof that it ever meant simply a rope. The passage of Diod. Sic., vol. i.
 104, Bip., was thought indeed by Bp. Middl. to supply this proof, but without reason. It respects the manner of harpooning the hippopotamus, and the words are these: εἰς τοὺς ἐν τῷ μεταγίγναι ἐνάπτοντες ἀρχὰς στυπίας, ἀφίεσι μίχρην αὐτὴν παραλυθῆ. But the very erudite Wesseling, in his note, determines it to mean 'between cable-ends.' Of this sense of ἀρχή, to denote end, Wesseling adduces two examples from Platarch and Philo-Jud.; and finally, he so explains the present passage of Acts. Assuredly there is no proof made out that ἀρχή can of itself denote a rope; which would involve an intolerable casualité. The two learned Critics were deceived by not attending to the nature of the term δαδ-μίον, which has often, as here, a significatio praeputii, including the sense πρό or ἐκ σχοι-νίου. So Matt. xxi. 2, ἀφένετε τὸν δαδμίον.
 Mark xi. 4, τὸν πᾶλον δαδμίον. In this case the πρό or ἐκ must be understood according as the sense be suspension from, or tying to. Thus ἀρχή here denotes 'an angular corner,' as in Exod. xxxix. 15, ἐν ἀμφότεραις ταῖς ἀρχαῖς.
 Jos. Antt. iii. 6, ἐξήντητο δὲ τῶν κρίκων κα-λῶδία τὴν ἀρχὴν (I conj. τῇ ἀρχῇ, 'at the end') ἤλων χαλκίον ἐκδομίον. And here the true rendering will be, 'tied (up) the four γῆς¹² ἐν ᾗ ὑπῆρχε πάντα τὰ τετράποδα τῆς γῆς καὶ τὰ θηρία καὶ τὰ ἔρπετά, καὶ τὰ πετεινὰ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ.¹³ Καὶ ἐγένετο φωνὴ πρὸς αὐτόν· Ἀναστὰς, Πέτρε, θύσον καὶ φάγε. ¹⁴ Ὁ δὲ Πέτρος εἶπε· Μηδαμῶς, Κύριε· ὅτι οὐδέποτε ἔφαγον πᾶν κοινὸν ἢ ἀκάθαρτον.¹⁵ Καὶ φωνὴ πάλιν ἐκ δευτέρου πρὸς αὐτόν· Ἄ ὁ Θεὸς ἐκαθάρισε, ἡ σὺ μὴ κοῖνον! ¹⁶ Τοῦτο δὲ ἐγένετο ἐπὶ τρίς· καὶ πάλιν ἀνελήφθη τὸ σκεῦος εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν.

¹⁷ Ὡς δὲ ἐν ἑαυτῷ διηπόρει ὁ Πέτρος, τί ἂν εἴη τὸ ὄραμα δ ends' (or 'angular corners'). Bp. Middleton, indeed, objects to the introduction of the the, because there is no Article in the Greek; forgetting that he thus falls into the very error for which he so often censures Wakef.; that of not bearing in mind those many cases where the absence of the Article affords no presumption of the noun being indefinite. Accordingly, Mr. Alford's assertion, that the above sense would require the Article, is quite ungrounded. He renders, 'by four rope-ends;' forgetting that there is for that version a want of something more than an Article,—namely, σχοινίου or στυπίναις. Besides, the sense thus resulting would be inapposite, since the four rope-ends would not draw together the sheet so as to make it a sort of hollow vessel; which would be done by tying up each of the four corners. It is strange that Mr. Alf. should pronounce it difficult to account for the insertion of δεδαμένον καὶ, which he has, he says, retained doubtfully. He need have had no doubt; since, though they are really indispensable to make any tolerable sense of the passage, yet their absence from some 7 or 8 MSS. (for the et alii of Scholz is nihil; and they are in all the Lamb., Mus., and Trin. Coll. copies) is easily accounted for by the Critics not understanding the force of the words; so that, observing them absent at the parallel passage infra xi. 5, they made bold to expunge them here. Without refining so much as is done by some writers, it may be sufficient to suppose that, as the vision was partly intended to intimate a truth which it was highly necessary for the Apostle now to learn,—that the distinction between Jews and Gentiles was to be done away,—so it was chiefly meant to inculcate another truth which should pave the way to the abrogation of the distinction between meats, which had, more than any thing else, kept Jews and Gentiles apart. And of this, and no more than this, Peter seems at the time to have understood it; especially since the Jewish Rabbis themselves admitted that at the coming of the Messiah the distinction of meats would be done away. But the event showed that a far higher truth (for to refer the four ἀπὸ to the four parts of heaven, the N., E., S., and W., is simply absurd)—though not directly taught in the vision—was to be learnt by him,—namely, that the distinction of nations in the sight of God was to pass away, together with the distinction of meats and the ceremonial law, originally intended to keep the Jews distinct from the other nations of the world, but now in Christ to be abrogated, and the middle wall of partition to be broken down, and both Jews and Gentiles admitted to the One God and Father of all.

12. Τετράποδα denotes the tame beasts, πορτα, as θηρία the wild ones, γγτγ. So Orpheus, Argon. 73, κηλήσω δέ τι θήραν, ἥδ' ἔρπετά καὶ πετεινά. Æschyl. Choepr. 576—584; comp. also 3 Kings iv. 33 (Sept.), where it is said of Solomon, that he discoursed περὶ τῶν κτηνῶν καὶ περὶ τῶν πετεινῶν καὶ περὶ τῶν ἔρπετων καὶ περὶ τῶν ἰχθύων, where κτηνῶν (which word sometimes in the Sept. denotes wild beasts, as well as tame ones) means beasts and animals generally, both wild and tame. Exactly as in Hdot. iii. 18, where is described the table spread for the Sun, we have λαϊμῶν—ἐκίπλωσεν κραιὴν ἑθῶν πᾶντων τῶν τετραπόδων.

14. κοινόν 'impure,' 'unclean.' How it comes to have this sense see my Lex.

15. πάλιν ἐκ δευτέρου] This is generally considered as a pleonastic expression, of which examples from the later writers have been adduced by the Commentators. Here, however, the so-called pleonasm rather communicates an intensity of sense, as serving to introduce the weighty expression following, ὁ Θεὸς ἐκαθάρκοινον, to understand which we must premise that ἐκαθάρ. means, by an idiom common to Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, 'heath declared pure,' i. e. made so, by abrogating the Law which forbade its use. And so in Schemoth Rabbi, fol. 118, 3, on the words of Job xxxi. 32, 'the stranger did not lodge in the street,' it is said: 'Non enim Deus κοινοῖ, profanum judicat, quemquam hominem.' We must here understand that under the literal truth, here denoted by the above representation, that the distinction between animals intended for man's use as food was done away, there was intimated a yet deeper truth, revealed, as it were, from on high, by letting down clean and unclean in the same vessel,—namely, that God would in future regard men not as clean and unclean, but all alike as clean in his sight, and all regarded as pure, for the sake of his beloved Son.

16. ἐπὶ τρίς] lit. 'unto thrice.' The vision was thrice repeated, in order to show the certainty of the thing. So in Gen. xli. 32, Pharaoh's dream is doubled, to show its reality, and that it is from God. The expression occurs in Polyb. iii. 28; though εἰς τρίς occurring in Xen. Cyr. vii. 1, 2, is pure Greek.

17. ἐν ἑαυτῷ διηπόρει—τί ἂν εἴη] 'was doubting in himself,' i. e. 'in his own mind, what it might mean.' Joseph. Ant. ii. 8, τί πότῃ εἴη τὸ φάντασμα παρ' ἑαυτῷ σκοπών;

Here, as Dr. A. Clarke well points out, we have an admirable display of the economy of Divine Providence by an arrangement of events to fit each other, and to harmonize one with another; it being, in the present case, so ordered, that in the very moment when Peter's mind was εἶδε, καὶ ἰδοὺ, οἱ ἄνδρες οἱ ἀπεσταλμένοι ἀπὸ τοῦ Κορινθίου, διερωτήσαντες τὴν οἰκίαν Σίμωνος, ἐπέστησαν ἐπὶ τὸν πυλῶνα· in doubt about the full meaning of the vision, the very event occurs which shall remove his perplexity.

18. φωνήσαντες] 'addressing,'—namely, the servants, or that particular one who opened the door. See infra xii. 13.

19. εἶπεν αὐτῷ τὸ Πν.] meaning, 'that this was said by the inner prompting of the Holy Spirit.' See note supra viii. 29.

20. ἀλλὰ—μηδὲν διακρίν.] The ἀλλὰ, 'age!' (an hortative Particle often used to introduce a verb of motion in the Imperat.) is to be applied to the whole of the words following; q. d. 'Make no scruple about the person thou art called to; but go at once!' The ἐγὼ is very emphatic. Render: 'It is I who, &c. I, the Holy Spirit, sent from the Father to guide men into all truth: I have brought about the Divine purpose by sending the men.'

21. ἐγὼ εἰμι ὃν ζητεῖτε] So Eurip. Orest. 374. ὃδ' εἰμ' Ὀρίστη—ὃν ἱστορεῖς.

23. καὶ τινες τῶν ἀδελφῶν] In number six, as we learn from xi. 12, doubtless taken as witnesses of what might take place.

24. τῇ ἐπαύριον] On the morrow after the day he had set out; for the journey, being one of 15 leues distance, was too great for one day.

—τοὺς ἀναγκαίους φίλους] Ὁ ἀνάγκαιος, like necessarius in Latin, denotes relations, whether by consanguinity, or by affinity; and sometimes persons connected by the bonds of friendship.

When φίλοι is added, the sense is more determinate, and means intimate friends. See xxx. in my Lex.

25. I have here, with Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., admitted the τοῦ before εἰσελθ., from A, B, C, E, G, and many cursives, including all the Lamb. and most of the Mss. copies, confirmed by internal evidence, in the difficulty and harshness of the reading, which is, indeed, inexplicable, on the principle suggested by Alf. It would seem to be a use of τοῦ for ἐπὶ τῷ at the very instant of Peter's entrance.

—προσεκύνησεν] This carried with it a prostration of the body to the earth, and was a mark of profound respect, which was paid not only to monarchs, but also to other persons of high dignity; though by the Oriental nations, Greeks and Romans, it was rendered to the Deity alone. Certainly Cornelius, who was εὐσεβὴς καὶ φοβούμενος τὸν Θεόν, could not intend to offer any mark of respect inconsistent with his duty to God. He no doubt regarded Peter (as having been the subject of a preternatural communication) in the light of a Divine legate, and, as such, entitled to a mark of reverence similar to that offered to the Deity himself. Peter, on the other hand, bearing in mind the very different custom of the Romans, with unaffected religious humility declined it.

28. One may observe, with Whitby and others, how admirably adapted was Peter's discourse to ἀθέμιτον ἐστὶν ἀνδρὶ Ἰουδαίῳ κολλᾶσθαι ἢ προσέρχεσθαι ἀλλοφύλῳ. καὶ ἐμοὶ ὁ Θεὸς ἔδειξε μηδένα κοινὸν ἢ ἀκάθαρτον λέγειν ἄνθρωπον. ²⁹ Διὸ καὶ ἀναντιρρήτως ἦλθον μεταπεμφθεῖς. πυνθάνομαι οὖν, τίνι λόγῳ μετεπέμψασθέ με; ³⁰ καὶ ὁ Κορνήλιος ἔφη· Ἀπὸ τετάρτης ἡμέρας μέχρι ταύτης τῆς ὥρας ἡμην νηστεύων, καὶ τὴν ἐννάτην ὥραν προσευχόμενος ἐν τῷ οἴκῳ μου καὶ ἰδοὺ, ἀνὴρ ἕστη ἐνώπιόν μου ἐν ἐσθῇτι λαμπρᾷ, ³¹ καὶ φησὶ· Κορνήλιε, ^{n ver. 4 &c. Dan. 10. 12. Heb. 1. 10.} εἰσηκούσθη σου ἡ προσευχή, καὶ αἱ ἐλεημοσύναι σου ἐμνήσθησαν ἐνώπιον τοῦ Θεοῦ. ³² Πέμψον οὖν εἰς Ἰόππην, καὶ μετακάλεσαι Σίμωνα ὃς ἐπικαλεῖται Πέτρος· οὗτος ξενίζεται ἐν οἰκίᾳ Σίμωνος βυρσέως παρὰ θάλασσαν· ὃς παραγενόμενος λαλήσει σοι. ³³ Ἐξαυτῆς οὖν ἔπεμψα πρὸς σε σύ τε καλῶς ἐποιήσας παραγενόμενος. Νῦν οὖν πάντες ἡμεῖς ἐνώπιον τοῦ Θεοῦ πάρεσμεν ἀκούσαι πάντα τὰ προστεταγμένα σοι ὑπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ.

bring about the conversion of the persons addressed; his arguments being exactly fitted to the condition of persons acquainted with the fundamental principles of true religion, though they had not embraced the Law of Moses. These persons, however, were so much more advanced than proselytes of the gate usually were, that Peter addresses them in nearly the same way as he would the Jews. Compare also Rom. ii. 11. v. 12.

— ἀθέμιτον] This is not well rendered 'unlawful,' as 1 Pet. i. 3; for the thing was not forbidden by the letter at least of the law, though such was implied in its injunctions. See Joseph. c. Apion. ii. 28, 36, and Antt. xvi. 11. It seems to be rather equiv. to ἀσεβῆς, and ὡς means 'how;' e. g. 'how impious a thing it is.'

— ἀλλοφύλῳ] The word properly means only a foreigner; but, as Kuinoel observes, it is in the Sept., Philo, and Josephus, used (as here) in a peculiar sense, so as to denote such as are not Jews, either by birth or by religion, and are elsewhere styled ἔθνη, or ἀλλότριοι, Gentiles.

Where it seems to be so used, there is an ellipse of some preposition, as κατὰ: κατὰ τὴν τετάρτην ἡμέραν ἀπὸ ταύτης τῆς ἡμέρας. And the sense is: 'At the 4th day from to-day (i. e. four days ago) I was fasting up to this hour of the day.'

— λαμπρᾷ] 'white and radiant,' as at Luke xxiii. 11, περιβαλὼν αὐτὸν ἱσθῆτα λαμπράν, and sometimes in the later Classics.

³⁴ προσωπολήπτης] See my Lex. in v., and note on Luke xx. 21.

In order, however, to avoid the dangerous notion which has been founded on these words,—as if to fear God and work righteousness, under any form of religious belief, were the only duties essential to salvation,—see the remarks of Drs. Hales and Townsend. And to avoid the opposite error, see Bp. Bull's Harm. Ap. ch. ii. § 6, and the note of Dr. A. Clarke on this passage.

36. The Apostle now briefly adverts to the principal particulars of the Gospel history, their design and certainty, and states the nature and sufficiency of the evidence of Christ's resurrection—his authority as the Judge of quick and dead—and the testimony of the Jewish prophets (whom they had been taught to respect), that, through his name, whosoever believeth in him, shall receive remission of sins.

—τὸν λόγον ὃν ἀπέστειλε, &c.] There is here a certain perplexity of construction, which Commentators have endeavoured in various ways to unravel, either by making some slight alteration, or by taking the Accusative as put for a Nominative. But, after all, the only satisfactory method is to connect τὸν λόγον with οἶδατε in the next verse, and place οὗτος—Κύριος in a parenthesis; thus repeating ῥήμα, as synonymous with λόγον, and in apposition with it.

—εὐαγγελιζόμενος εἰρήνην] 'proclaiming, or announcing peace' (see Is. xl. 9); meaning the way whereby man, being reconciled to God, might find peace, pardon, and acceptance.

—πάντων Κύριος] 'Lord of all'; meaning both Jews and Gentiles; since, as Lord of all, he must alike intend the salvation of all. So Rom. x. 12, ὁ γὰρ αὐτὸς Κύριος πάντων, both Jew and Greek.

38. Ἰησοῦν τὸν ἀπὸ Ν.] This is suspended on the οἶδατε preceding; and in οἶδατε Ἰησοῦν ὃν ἐχρυσεν αὐτὸν there is a common Greek idiom.—Ἐχρυσεν, by a metaphor taken from the mode of inaugurating kings, signifies invested and endowed, namely, at his baptism. See iv. 27, or Luke iv. 18. In Πνεύματι ἁγίῳ καὶ δυνάμει there is a Hendiadys; and the sense is, 'with the powerful influence of the Holy Spirit for the work of the Messiah.' See Matt. iii. 16, 17. The general sense couched in εὐεργετῶν is particularized and exemplified in the words following, καὶ ἰώμενος—Διαβόλου.

39. τῶν Ἰουδαίων] A peculiar idiomatic use for τῆς Ἰουδαίας, as in Luke xxiii. 5, ἀπὸ Ἀριμ. πόλεως τῶν Ἰουδαίων.

—ὃν καὶ ἀνείλον κρεμ. ἐπὶ ξύλου] Render: 'whom they slew by hanging on a gibbet.' See note supra v. 30.

41. προκεχειροτ.] I would not, with Kuin, and others, take this for the simple χειρ., since, as χειρ. imports appointment, so does προ. denote previous destination. Peter may, as Alf. thinks, have had in mind his Lord's words, οὗς δίδωκε μοι ἐκ τοῦ κοσμοῦ, John xvii. 6.—Μετὰ τὸ ἀναστῆναι αὐ. ἐκ ν. Some Editors and Expositors join the words with v. 40, placing the intermediate words, οὐ παντὶ—συνεπίομεν αὐτῷ, in a parenthesis. This they are induced to do, because, they urge, we do not find that our Lord ate, however he might eat, with his disciples after his resurrection. Yet though that be not directly said, it seems implied at John xxi. 13.

42. ὁ ὠρισμένος ὑπὸ—Θ. κριτῆς ζ. κ. νεκρ.] On the full force of ὠρισμ., see Bp. Sherlock, and Bp. Pearson on the Creed. At xvii. 3. St. Paul, preaching to Gentiles, brings forward this appointment of Judge over all men as the grand theme of his teaching. Hence, here, the expression, as Alf. well observes, 'gives at once a universality to the office and mission of Christ, which paves the way to the great Truth declared in the next verse.'

43. ἀφesis ἀμαρτιῶν—αὐτόν] From the anomalous nature of the construction here, several recent Editors read αὐτόν . . . , to indicate that the sentence was left incomplete,—namely, by the falling of the Holy Spirit on the hearers, and their breaking out and speaking in new tongues. This method, however, is purely hypothetical, and quite unnecessary, since the words in question, though containing a slight irregularity in the construction (which is a Latinized one), yield a complete sense; being, I conceive, intended to show the subject and substance of that testimony,—namely, 'that whosoever, &c.' The passages of the Prophets here meant are such as Is. xxviii. 16, and Zech. xiii. 1, where the latter prophet says that 'a fountain shall be opened for sin,' &c. Thus from μαρτυροῦσιν we must take μαρτυροῦντες (to usher in the next clause), understanding it in the sense declaring, as at John iv. 44, ἐμαρτύρησεν, ὅτι προφήτης ἐν τῇ ἰδίᾳ πατρίδι τιμὴν οὐκ ἔχει. Moreover, πάντες,—which the Commentators say must be taken restrictedly, for very many,—may have its usual force; for all the Prophets, as a body, more or less testify of Christ. So Luke xxiv. 27. All, indeed, either directly or by implication, in holding forth the promise of a Messiah, virtually teach that 'whosoever believeth in him shall not be confounded.' And no wonder, since their very religion was mainly founded on the belief of a Messiah to come.

44. Peter's address seems to have been here interrupted by the effect of an immediate effusion of the Holy Spirit on his hearers in their being endowed with the gift of tongues, and, as it seems, suddenly using that faculty. This is plain from the Apostle's words at xi. 15, in describing this phenomenon, ἐπέκεισε τὸ Πνεῦμα—αὐτοὺς, ὥσπερ καὶ ἐφ' ἡμᾶς, meaning, 'in the very way that it did on us at the beginning,' i. e. of the gift of the Spirit to speak with tongues, where ἐν τῷ ἀρξασθαι με λαλῆν means, 'when I was beginning,' or 'proceeding to speak'—of what it is not said; but it probably was, about comprehending all nations (his hearers included) in the number of those to whom the blessing of salvation was now extended. In fact, the actual exercise of the gift of tongues is directly mentioned at v. 46; for, by γλώσσαις there must be meant, as at supra ii. 4, ἰδιόταις γλώσσαις, where see note; and so xix. 6. Comp. 1 Cor. xii. 30. xiv. 2, 5, 6, 18, 25, 39. In short, the gift was evidently the very same throughout the whole of the passages referred to. The γὰρ at v. 46 has reference to a clause omitted, such as the following: ['and that it had been poured forth on these persons is certain] for they heard,' &c.

47. μήτι τὸ ὕδωρ κωλ., &c.] q. d. 'Such being the case,—they being evidently favoured with the same Gospel as the Jewish converts on the day of Pentecost—are they not clearly entitled to the privilege of Christian baptism, without being first circumcised?' Accordingly, that unanswerable argument settled the question, which would otherwise have continued to arise, and cause divisions among professing Christians. To give greater force to this declaration, the mode of interrogation, involving a strong negation, is employed; and still more so by the μή before βαπτισθ. By τὸ ὕδωρ is meant 'the water of Baptism;' or perhaps the word is used to make it match with τὸ Πνεῦμα.—On further consideration, I cannot see reason to agree with those Expositors (including Mr. Alf.) who regard the expression κωλύσαι, used with τὸ ὕδωρ, as proving that the practice was, to bring the water to the Candidates (for baptism), not the Candidates to the water. No practice can be inferred from a single case so extraordinary as this. Besides, the very same expression, τί κωλύει με βαπτισθῆναι; occurs supra viii. 36; a case where it is plain that baptism by immersion was employed. The expression may, indeed, seem more naturally to refer to water's being brought, and the persons in question being baptized by affusion; and, from the peculiar circumstances, it may have been so; but whether it was so is uncertain. At any rate, the bringing the water is by no means implied in μή κωλύσαι; The annexed injunction, that they should be baptized, does not imply that baptism was administered on the spot. It might be elsewhere, at a convenient place, and probably on the same day. Those who administered it were, we may suppose, the brethren whom Peter brought with him from Joppa. The Apostles rarely baptized; why, will appear from 1 Cor. i. 14, comp. with John iv. 2.

XI. 1—18. Here there is narrated the result of the foregoing transaction, in the extreme dissatisfaction of the believers of the Circumcision (including the Apostles); and in Peter being publicly called upon to give an account of his conduct, in which he rests his defence on a simple statement of the circumstances (attested by the Christians of Joppa, whom he had brought with him) which led to the step he had taken,—in admitting Gentiles into the Church by baptism. On hearing which, the Jewish converts acquiesced in the justice of his reasons, and glorified God. 'In the remarkable narrative contained in this and the foregoing chapter, we see the performance by Peter of that which Christ intended should be done by him, when he promised to Peter, and to him only of the Apostles, that he should be the first to unlock the door of faith and of the Gospel to the Gentiles. He had said that he would build his Church to endure for ever, against which the gates of hell should not prevail, which had prevailed against the Jewish Church; and to Peter our Lord declared he would give the keys of the kingdom of heaven, that Peter might open a door for the bringing in of the Gospel to that Church; which was performed by Peter, as we learn from the present portion. Here, accordingly, 'the keys of the kingdom of heaven,' committed to Peter so long ago (Matt. xvi. 19), do their work; opening the door of faith first to the Gentiles, which never was shut since, nor ever will be, whilst there is a Church to be upon the earth.' (Lightfoot.)

1. κατὰ τῆς [1.] lit. 'over,' or 'throughout Judea.'

2. διεκρίνοντο πρὸς αὐτόν] 'expostulated with him, litigating the question.' The word answers to the Hebrew וַיִּבְחַן, and signifies properly, 'to be impeached in a suit with another'—then, 'to be opposed in argument.'

3. ἀκροβ. ἔχοντας] Synonymous with ἡ ἀκροβυστία ὄντες, 'uncircumcised.'

5—17. ἐγὼ ἤμην, &c.] The argument in this portion goes to show, that the thing did not proceed from himself, but from God; 'He who caused me to fall into the trance, He it was who showed me the vessel. But I contradicted, and did not render prompt obedience. God sent me, but I did not go: God told me to baptize, but I did not even then baptize. It is God who hath baptized them all, and not I. For, as I was yet speaking, the Holy Spirit fell on them, and they spake with tongues.' See notes on x. 30, seqq.

5. τέσσαρσιν ἀρχαῖς] The sense here cannot be made complete without supplying δαδόμενον, which is expressed supra x. 11; where see note.

17. εἰ] 'siquidem,' 'if [as was the case].'

— ἔδωκεν αὐτοῖς—πιστιύσασιν] Render: 'God bestowed on them the same gift as on us, on their believing; πιστ. being Particip. of cause, or condition.'

— ἐγὼ δὲ τίς ἤμην, δυνατός] The δὲ is omitted in many MSS. and Versions, but, I suspect, from the difficulty of explaining it. Yet it may very well be rendered denique, then. There is great spirit in this turn of expression, τίς ἦμην (apparently a popular one), with which Wets. compares from Lucian, ἥρῳτα τὸν Δ. τίς ὦν, χλευάζει τὰ αὐτοῦ;

18. μετάνοιαν] meaning, as at v. 31, 'the grace of repentance.' See Calvin.

19. This verse introduces a new train of narration. And from this point the history takes a new direction; and, from recording the preaching of the Gospel to the Jews only, it proceeds to narrate the labours of the Apostles to convert the Gentiles, commencing with their exertions at the important city of Antioch.

20. εἰσελθόντες] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read, from five uncial MSS. and some cursives (to which I can add 1 Lamb. and 2 Mus. copies), ἐλθόντες, perhaps rightly. See note on Matt. ii. 21. As respects the disputed reading, Ἑλλημιστάς or Ἕλληνας, on carefully reconsidering the puzzling question, I am ready to admit, that there is so much to be said for the latter, that there were there more external authority for the reading, I should be ready to admit it. But the authority of two uncials only,—one of no credit for accuracy (D), is too slender. Nevertheless, though no cursive has hitherto been adduced, I can furnish one, an important MS., Lamb. 1184; and when all the yet uncollated cursive MSS. shall have been collated, and most of those hitherto collated recollated, others, I doubt not, will be found. If Ἕλληνας be regarded as the true reading, which it probably is, we must regard the word as designating Gentiles uncircumcised, but Proselytes of the Gate (and so infra xiv. 1, and xvii. 4).—in short, exactly in the same class as Cornelius. Whether, however, their conversion took place, as Alford thinks, 'before any tidings had reached Jerusalem of the Divine sanction given in the case of Cornelius, is a matter of doubt; et adhuc sub judice lis est.' That the two cases were nearly simultaneous, there is every reason to believe. However, I agree with Mr. Alford, that it was at Antioch—whither Barnabas fetched Paul from Tarsus—rather than at Cæsarea, that the real commencement of the Gentile Church took place—although simultaneously—for the convincing of the Jewish believers at Jerusalem, and of Peter—the important events at Cæsarea and Joppa were by Divine Providence brought about.

21. καὶ ἦν χεὶρ Κυρίου μετ' αὐτῶν] An Oriental mode of speaking, to signify that 'they were aided by the power and support of the Lord' (see Luke i. 66, and note),—namely, for the work of conversion spoken of in the words following; as infra xiii. 12, and 1 Pet. i. 6. This use is one derived from the Old Test., where it occurs in Exod. ix. 3. Judg. ii. 15. 1 Sam. vii. 13. xii. 13. 1 Kings xxii. 17. 2 Kings xiv. 19. The Article might seem necessary, and is found in Deut. ii. 15; but the idea of poterity, while seeming to demand the presence, permits the absence of the Article. Before πιστεύσας, just after, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. prefix ὁ, from MSS. A, B, and others; not merely No. 180, as Alford, but also 36, New Coll. Oxf. 1. I cannot, however, add even one from the Lamb., Mus., and Trin. Coll. copies. But the authority is insufficient; and internal evidence is against the reading; for, although it is not without force, yet not such as is suitable here, where the Participle is used, like the Latin gerund, to denote cause, or 'means;' the sense being, 'by having believed [and been baptized].' It is far more likely that the ὁ should have been inserted by those who did not understand the true force of the Participle, than that it should (as Alford thinks) have been removed by those who did not perceive its force.

22. ἠκούσθη·εἰς τὰ ὦτα] 'came to the ears of,' a Hebraism, found in Ps. xviii. 7. Isa. v. 9, and used in Luke i. 44. James v. 4.

23. τὴν χάριν τ. Θεοῦ] 'the favour and merciful kindness of God,'—namely, in its effects,—the admission of the Gentiles to the benefits of the Gospel, and also the fruits of the grace of the Spirit, in the converts 'walking worthy of their high calling.' MSS. A, B, insert τὴν between χάρ. and τοῦ, which Alford, solely of the Editors, admits. But external authority is quite insufficient; for, as to Alford's et ceteri, those are purely imaginary. I have not found one in the Lamb., Mus., and Trin. Coll. collections; and internal evidence is against τὴν, which produces a very forced sense, even in Alford's version,—'The grace which (evidently) was that of God.' The expression, Alford says, is deliberately used of a good man full of the

ἐχάρη, καὶ παρεκάλει πάντας τῇ προθέσει τῆς καρδίας προσμένειν τῷ Κυρίῳ. ²⁴ ὅτι ἦν ἀνὴρ ἀγαθὸς, καὶ πλήρης Πνεύματος ἁγίου καὶ πίστεως. καὶ προσετέθη ὄχλος ἱκανὸς τῷ Κυρίῳ. ²⁵ Ἐξήλθε δὲ εἰς Ταρσὸν ὁ Βαρνάβας ἀναζητῆσαι Σαῦλον καὶ εὐρὼν αὐτὸν, ἦγγαγεν αὐτὸν εἰς Ἀντιόχειαν. ²⁶ Ἐγένετο δὲ αὐτοὺς ἐνιαυτὸν ὅλον συναχθῆναι ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ, καὶ διδάξαι ὄχλον ἱκανόν, χρηματίζειν τε πρῶτον ἐν Ἀντιοχείᾳ τοὺς μαθητάς

Holy Ghost and of faith. But it is not here said of a good man, but of the grace and mercy of God shown to the sinners of the Gentiles, now admitted into the kingdom of God. This repetition of the Article often occurs in Attic Greek, but very rarely in the Sept. and New Test.; and when it does, its force is that of explanation, serving to make the thing more prominent; which, I imagine, was the purpose of the Critics who here inserted the τῇ, meaning to intimate, that it was God's grace which was at work in them, so that that grace did have the glory;—a truth well brought out by Calvin, whose note on the whole verse is full of edification. But this sense does not need the insertion of the τῇ. A modern Critic, too (Wakel.), stumbled at the simple Article, and, to remove the objection, rendered 'this grace of God,' as if ταύτην had followed.

—τῇ προθέσει τῆς καρδίας] The Genit. of the noun in regimen has here, as often, the force of an Adjective; the sense being, 'with hearty and determined purpose, and fixed resolution;' as Rom. xiii. 28. Eph. iii. 11. 2 Tim. i. 9. A similar mode of expression is found in the Class. writers. So Hidian, cited by Wolf, has ποθεῖν τινα ἀληθεῖ ψυχῆς διαθέσει. In the use of προσμένειν (on which see my Lex.) is intimated the firm adherence of the new converts to their baptismal engagement, by a constant exercise of faith and obedience.

²⁴ ὅτι ἦν ἀνὴρ ἀγαθός] The exact purpose of these words will depend on the construction of the whole context, where some Expositors (as Heinr.) would regard the words ὅτι παραγινόμενος—τῷ Κυρίῳ as parenthetic; but that is subverting the construction of the whole passage. The words are a continuation of the preceding, καὶ ἐξαπίστ.—Ἀντιόχ., and the words ὅτι ἀνὴρ ἀγαθός must be meant for the preceding,—to give a reason why he heartily rejoiced at seeing the work of Divine grace and mercy in such successful progress. This joy he would feel, as being ἀνὴρ ἀγ., 'a man of genuine benevolence and philanthropy' (so ἀνὴρ ἀγ. in Jos. Antt. xii. 9, 1), in that so many poor lost souls should be saved; and, from his full knowledge, through the Spirit, of the mysteries of the Gospel, he would also be enabled to fully appreciate the benefits of that 'so great salvation.' The plentitude of his spiritual gifts and graces would give a powerful effect to his exhortations. The next words, καὶ προσετέθη—Κυρίῳ, ought not to be severed from the preceding, of which they form the last clause, presenting the result of the preceding, in the eminent success of his missionary labours, by the accession of numerous converts to the faith. This I find confirmed by the Pesh. Syr. Version, and the Vulg., at least in the earliest Editions, and De Lya. The expression ὅτι

ἀνὴρ ἀγ. and πλήρ. Πν. ἀγ., &c., ought to be considered a conjoint description, and, as Calvin well observes, 'Notanda in boni viri descriptione epitheta plenus Spiritus, plenus fide. Postquam enim integrum dixit ac probum, hujus bonitatis fontem demonstrat, quod, carnis affectibus valere jussis duces Spiritus, pietatem toto animo coheret.' Moreover, because he was a good man, full of the Holy Spirit and of Faith, he was peculiarly qualified to discharge the office of exhortation. There is, however, a reference to the next words also; q. d. 'because he was all that has been said, much people was added to the Lord.'

²⁶ χρηματ.—Χρ.] 'to be denominated Christians.' The peculiar idiom, occurring also in Rom. vii. 3; and also often in Joseph. and Philo, is not merely Jewish Greek, since it occurs also in Polyb., Diod. Sic., Strabo, Plut., and Marc. Anton., and seems to have been an idiom of the ordinary, or, perhaps, Provincial Greek. It seems to have been derived from χρῆμα, 'money,' denoting the sum which the coin passes for in the business of commerce, and thus 'to pass for so and so.' It has been not a little debated whether the followers of Christ gave this appellation to themselves, or whether it was bestowed on them by others? The best Commentators are of the latter opinion; and Wetst. and Kuin. adduce many arguments why the former view cannot be admitted; not all of them equally cogent, but, upon the whole, sufficient to establish their position. It was, indeed, the interest of the Christians to have some name, which might not, like the Jewish ones (Nazarenes, Ναζωραῖοι, or Galileans), imply reproach. And though the terms believers, or saints, might suffice among themselves, yet the former was not sufficiently definite for an appellation, and the latter might be thought to savour of vanity. They would therefore be not disinclined to adopt one. Yet the necessity was not so great as to stimulate them to do this very soon; whereas the people at large, in having to speak of this new sect, would soon need some distinctive appellation; and what so distinctive as one formed from the name of its Founder? Thus we find from Philostr. Vit. Ap. viii. 21, that the disciples of Apollonius were called by the Greeks (it is not said by themselves) Ἀπολλωνίους. And it was likely that the Gentiles should resort to such a sort of appellation; since, in that age, those who were followers of any sect, or partisans of any leader, were usually called Χριστιανούς. 27 Ἐν ταύταις δὲ ταῖς ἡμέραις κατήλθον ἀπὸ Ἱεροσολύμων προφήται εἰς Ἀντιόχειαν. 28 Ὁ Ἀναστάς δὲ εἰς ο. ch. xi. 10. ἐξ αὐτῶν, ὀνόματι Ἀγαθος, ἐσήμανε διὰ τοῦ Πνεύματος λιμὸν μέγαν μέλλειν ἔσσεσθαι ἐφ' ὅλην τὴν οἰκουμένην ὅστις καὶ ἐγένετο ἐπὶ Κλαυδίου [Καίσαρος]. 29 Ὁ τῶν δὲ μαθητῶν, καθὼς ἡπο- p Rom. 15. 26, 28. 1 Cor. 10. 1. 2 Cor. 9. 1. XII. 1 Κατ' ἐκείνον δὲ τὸν καιρὸν ἐπέβαλεν Ἡρώδης ὁ βασι-

after their teacher, or leader, by a term ending in ios, or ianus. There is no reason to think, with Wetst. and Kuin., that the name Χριστιανός was given in derision. When used by Agrippa (Acts xxvi. 28), there is no proof that it was a term of reproach. Had he intended derision, he might have employed the term Nazarene, which was in frequent use among the Jews, and has continued in the East to the present day. Thus the followers of Christ would be the more likely to adopt the appellation Χριστιανοί, both for convenience, and to keep out a term of reproach. That they soon did adopt it, may be supposed from 1 Pet. iv. 16, εἰ δὲ ὡς Χριστιανός (πάσχει), μὴ αἰσχυνίσθω (scil. πάσχειν), where the appellation would seem to be one applied by the followers of Christ to themselves, as well as given by others, at least received by themselves. Be that as it may, the evidence of early antiquity abundantly attests that they soon gloried in it.

27. προφῆται] The term, as applied to denote the inspired teachers in the early Christian Church (exx. of which see in my Lex.), seems here to denote persons of either sex, who, with more or less of the supernatural gifts of the Holy Spirit, applied themselves to teaching in a high and exalted strain; and occasionally, under a more than usual influence of the Holy Spirit, foretold future events. They came next in order to the Apostles, and before the simple teachers, διδάσκαλοι (1 Cor. xvi. 28).

28. Ἀγαθος] The same person who afterwards prophesied Paul's imprisonment at Rome.

— ἐσήμανε] 'he declared,' or 'announced.' The term was often applied to the uttering of predictions, &c. So Joseph. Antt. vii. 8, σημαίνων τὴν ἐκ τοῦ παιδὸς ἰσομνήν ἐπιθεῖν. As to the disputed phrase, ὅλην τὴν οἰκουμένην, it would seem that it is here used nearly as at Luke ii. 1, as a somewhat hyperbolic mode of expression—which, as we may suppose, existed in the ordinary Greek dialect, or in the Provincial Greek of Syria and Asia Minor—to denote the whole of that part of the world, espec. Syria and Palestine, and the countries adjacent. The particular Famine predicted, and said to have taken place ἐν τῇ Κλαυδίῳ (for there were four), is probably the one mentioned by Joseph. Antt. xx. 2, 5, and 5, 2, and called by him τὸν μέγαν λιμὸν. But Joseph. does not, as Alf. says, extend it to the neighbouring countries, but only describes it as prevailing κατὰ τὴν Ἰουδαίαν, which, of course, does not prove that it did not extend to them. Joseph. says that queen Helena and her son alleviated the distress by gifts both of money and of corn, and other edibles.

29. καθὼς ἡπορεῖτό τις] The expression denotes only the being so well to do, as to have something more than a sufficiency for one's own wants. Comp. Plato, de Legg. καθ' ὅσον ὑπορεῖ τις. Musonius, ἀλλ' ὑπορεῖ χρημάτων ὅντις τινεὶ δὲ καὶ πλούσιοι, and espec. Menand. Δυσκ. 11, 11, χρῆσθαι (scil. χρήμασι) ἐπικουρεῖν πᾶσιν, ὑπόρουσιν κοίτῃ, οὗτε ἂν δύνῃ πλείστον, διὰ αὐτοῦ.

— εἰς διακονίαν] 'in subsidium,' 'for a service,' 'for the relief of.' So Act. Thom. § 56, ἐκόμισαν χρήματα πολλὰ εἰς τὴν διακονίαν τῶν χρωῶν. This relief was the more necessary, since, independently of the present famine, the Christians at Jerusalem were generally poor. In transmitting this bounty they did but imitate the example of the foreign Jews, who (as Vitrings has proved) used to send contributions for the relief of their poor brethren at Jerusalem.

30. τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους] Hammond has here an able annotation on the origin and various uses of πρεσβύτεροι, showing that in the Christian Church of the Apostolic age (which was formed almost wholly on the model of the synagogue), the term πρεσβύτεροι (a term implying rather the wisdom of age, than age itself) was synonymous with ἐπίσκοποι. Their common office and duty (in the words of Forbiger ap. Schleus. Lex.) was in general to govern the Christian Church, not to teach; to preside over things sacred, to administer the sacraments, especially the Eucharist, to decide on ecclesiastical matters, to compose and settle differences, and, finally, to set an example to all, of rectitude of doctrine and sanctity of life; see xx. 17, 28. Phil. i. 1. 1 Tim. iii. 1. Tit. i. 5, 7. 1 Pet. v. 1, 2.

The τίτλη ἐπίσκοπος, as denoting one person, superior to the πρεσβύτεροι, seems to have not been used in the age of the Apostles, if, at least, we except St. John.

XII. Here we have related a new persecution, raised against the infant Church by Herod Agrippa, and, in consequence thereof, the martyrdom of James, and the imprisonment and miraculous deliverance of Peter,—events, however, quickly succeeded by the death of the persecutor (vv. 20—24). Whereupon the word of God prospers.

1. κατ' ἐκείνον τὸν καιρὸν] i. e. before the arrival of Barnabas and Saul at Jerusalem.

— ἐπέβαλε—τὰς χεῖρας] An expression to denote 'the doing personal violence by seizing,'

εἶλε δὲ Ἰάκωβον τὸν ἀδελφὸν Ἰωάννου μαχαίρα. ³ Καὶ ἰδὼν

αὐτοῦ. ⁶ Ὅτε δὲ ἐμελλεν αὐτὸν προάγειν ὁ Ἡρώδης, τῇ νυκτὶ
ἐκείνῃ ἦν ὁ Πέτρος κοιμώμενος μεταξὺ δύο στρατιωτῶν, δεδεμένος or otherwise. The construction is, by a sort of grammatical attraction, for ἐπίβαλε τὰς χεῖρας ἐπὶ τινὰς, κακῶσαι αὐτούς. — κακῶσαι is a general term, meaning, 'to annoy,' 'vex,' by a sort of passive persecution.

² ἀνείλε μαχαίρα] 'beheaded him.' This kind of death was, it seems, selected as being (see the Rabbinical writers cited by Lightf. and Wetst.) the most ignominious of the capital punishments among the Jews.

³ ἰδὼν ὅτι ἀρεστὸν ἐστὶ τοῖς Ἰουδ.] By the Jews some understand the Sanhedrim. And, indeed, the word has often that meaning in the Gospel of St. John; but never, I think, in St. Luke's writings. We may therefore understand it of the Jews generally, both rulers and people. And that this Herod was studious of obliging the Jewish people, we learn from Joseph. Antt. xix. 7, 8, in his able sketch of his character, which was in all respects such as to please the Jews, both Rulers and people; he being of a truly royal liberality, and fond of show, ἡδόμενος τῷ χαρίζεσθαι, καὶ τῷ βιοῦν ἐν ἐφημέρια χαίρων. And when we add to this, that he is described as one scrupulously performing all the observances of the Jewish ceremonial Law, we shall be at no loss to account for his setting this example of bitter persecution of the Christians, whereby he thought he should gratify both Priests and people; exactly as Felix, on quitting his government, left Paul in bonds, out of a desire to gratify τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις.

— προσέθετο συλλαβεῖν] 'he proceeded to seize.' A Hebraism, from קָנָה, and a verb in the Infinitive, preceded by the Preposition ἐν. So Luke xx. 11, 12, where see note. The idiom is here highly suitable; for this apprehension of Peter was another step in the course of active and bitter persecution.

— αἱ ἡμέραι τῶν ἀζύμων] 'the days of the paschal feast, during which the Jews were ordered to have no leavened bread in their houses;' see Deut. xvi. 3. Exod. xii. 18. Before ἡμέραι, MSS. A, D, E, and several cursives, some of them ancient, have the Article, which is admitted by Matthæi, Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., and Alf. Bp. Middl., however, justifies the omission of the Article on the principle, that 'in propositions which merely affirm or deny existence, the name of the person, or thing, whereof existence is affirmed or denied, is without the Article.' So Matt. xiv. 6, γευσάτων ἀγομίστων τοῦ Ἡρώδου, and John v. 1. That principle, however, is, I apprehend, too refined and far-fetched. It were better in such a case to say, that the Article is omitted because unnecessary. — the addition of the noun in the Genit. sufficing to establish the definiteness. Alf., indeed, thinks it was removed, because unnecessary. But it was more likely to be added, because it was thought necessary. And when I consider the slenderness of external evidence for the word (to which I can add only 1 Lamb. and 2 Mus. copies, with Trin. Coll. B, x. 16, all the other Lamb. and Mus. copies being without the Article) I cannot admit it. Indeed Tisch., in his 2nd Edit. rejects it. Scholz's 'alii plurimi,' are, of course, of little weight; at any rate, in a case like this, where internal evidence is so strong against a word, and external authority has not its usual force.

⁴ τετραδίοις] The τετράδιον was, as we learn, Polyb. vi. 33, the regular number for a guard (as 'a file' with us); and four such quaternions were thought necessary to guard the cell, and the approaches to it, and also to serve for necessary relief of guard.

— μετὰ τὸ πάσχα] Render: 'after the Passover;' i. e. the days of the Feast. During this holy season it was thought unlawful to prosecute any capital trial, still more to take away life; and Herod, as Joseph. tells us, τὰ πάτρια καθαρῶς ἐτήρει, 'observed them entirely.'

— μεταξὺ δύο στρατιωτῶν — δυοῖ] Prisoners, when thus carefully guarded, were usually, among the Romans, secured with a single chain; one end of which was attached to the right hand of the prisoner, and the other to the left hand of the person who guarded him. So Jos. Antt. xviii. 6, 7 (of Agrippa himself), ἡξίωσε τὸν συνδεδεμένον αὐτῷ στρατιώτην. In the present instance, for further security, there were two chains, each fastened to a soldier; which Wieseler proves was directed to be done in a case of need.

— ἐτήρουν τὴν φυλ.] 'guarded the prison.'
 7. τῷ οἰκήμ.] 'the chamber,' or 'cell.' As to the disputed question of the situation of the prison, the most probable opinion is that of Walch., who supposes it to have been in one of the towers of the innermost of the three walls which surrounded the city; and the 'iron gate,' he thinks, was at the entrance of the tower. This opinion is confirmed and illustrated by what I have said in my note on Thucyd. ii. 4.

— πατάξας] for νύξας, as used in Homer, Od. κ. 483, ἀγγῶνι νύξας, as is usually done in rousing persons from sleep.

8. περιῴσωσαι] See note on Luke xii. 35.

— ὑπόδησαι τὰ σανδάλιά σου] This is, as Chrys. remarks, a beautifully graphic circumstance; for, in the haste of his sudden departure, Peter would be likely to forget to bind on his sandals. The angel therefore tells him to do it; thereby intimating to him his perfect security.

10. πρῶτην—σιδηρᾶν] Φυλακὴ means one of the above-mentioned parties on guard. We may suppose what is here called the first guard to have been the two soldiers stationed (see my Lex.) at the door of the cell; the second, those stationed at the door which led out of the building into a court-yard; and the third, those at the iron gate, which led out of the court into the city.—Αὐτομάτῃ, lit. 'self-moved.' Pric. and Wets. adduce several examples of the word in this sense, and as used of doors; e. g. Hom. II. x. 749. So the Latin writers (as Virgil, Æn. vi. 82) used the expression sub sponte.

11. γενόμενος ἐν ἑαυτῷ] 'having recovered his self-consciousness,' and become capable of reflection.

— πάσης τῆς προσδ.] Meaning, by metonymy, 'the thing expected by the people,'—namely, his being brought out for trial and execution.

12. συνιδὼν] 'having become conscious,' or 'aware of' his situation. So xiv. 6, συνιδόντας—κατέφυγον.

13. κρούσαντος—τὴν θύραν] This phrase occurs also in Luke xiii. 25, and often in the later Classical writers; the earlier and purer ones use κύπτειν. Τὴν θύραν τ. πυλῶνος, 'the porch-door,' or 'outer gate,' as opposed to 'the inner door,' which led immediately to the court around which the apartment was built. By παιδίσκη many Commentators understand the portress. But though that office was often performed by females, it is improbable, considering the narrow circumstances of the Christians at Jerusalem, that there should have been a portress at this house. Besides, that would require the Article. The sense seems to be simply 'a damsel,' i. e. a maid-servant; among whose other employments was that of attending to the door. For such is the general sense of the expression ὑπακούσαι, which signifies properly 'to listen,' but when used of the office of a porter (which it often is in the best writers), it carries with it, by implication, other significations corresponding to the actions connected therewith; such as, 'to inquire the name and business of the person knocking.' So in Lucian, Icarom. p. 292, ἰκπτον προσελθὼν τὴν θύραν ὑπακούσας δὲ ὁ Ἑρμῆς καὶ τοῦνομα ἰκπυθόμενος. It came, however, at length to ἦλθε παιδίσκη ὑπακούσαι, ὀνόματι Ῥόδῃ ¹⁴ καὶ ἐπιγνούσα τὴν φωνὴν τοῦ Πέτρου, ἀπὸ τῆς χαρᾶς οὐκ ἤνοιξε τὸν πυλῶνα, εἰσδραμούσα δὲ ἀπήγγειλεν ἑστάναι τὸν Πέτρον πρὸ τοῦ πυλῶνος. ¹⁵ Οἱ δὲ πρὸς αὐτὴν εἶπον Μαίνη· ἡ δὲ διῶσχυρίζετο οὕτως ἔχειν. Οἱ δὲ ἔλεγον Ὁ ἄγγελος αὐτοῦ ἐστίν. ¹⁶ Ὁ δὲ Πέτρος ἐπέμενε κρούων ἀνοίξαντες δὲ εἶδον αὐτὸν, καὶ ἐξέστησαν. ¹⁷ Κατασεύσας δὲ αὐτοῖς τῇ χειρὶ συγᾶν, διηγήσατο αὐτοῖς πῶς ὁ Κύριος αὐτὸν ἐξήγαγεν ἐκ τῆς φυλακῆς. have simply the sense above indicated; as in Theophrast. Char. Eth. iv., where it is given as one of the traits of the vulgar man, καὶ κόψαντος (scil. τινός) τὴν θύραν, ὑπακούσαι αὐτόν, and Xen. Symp. i. 11, κρούσας τὴν θύραν, εἶπε τῷ ὑπακούσαντι εἰσαγγεῖλαι.

¹⁵ μαίνη] A popular form of expression, used of any one who utters what is incredible. Διῶσχυρίζετο, 'positively asserted.'

— ὁ ἄγγελος αὐτοῦ ἰ.] The sense must, as I have fully shown, be, 'his angel,' i. e. his tutelary angel, such as the Jews, and, indeed, the Gentiles, thought was appointed to every person, or, at least, every good person; see Matt. xviii. 10, and note. They also supposed, that, on the death of the person, this angel sometimes appeared in his exact form, and spake with his voice to the friends or acquaintance of the deceased. For what purpose they thought Peter's angel come, is uncertain.

— εἰς ἕτερον τόπον] Where, is a matter of pure conjecture, being left quite indefinite,—designedly so, Alford thinks. It is more natural to suppose that the place whither Peter went for refuge was so obscure a nook, that Luke did not think it worth while to record it. To suppose, as Expositors do, Antioch, Caesarea, or Rome, is preposterous. Peter might well wish to get away from Jerusalem, and go any where else; but for the present it would be impracticable. Meanwhile, as Bucer says, 'prorsus ab hostium suorum oculis se subduxit,'—seeking some place the most obscure, and thereby the most secure. Mr. Alf. says, not without reason, that he sees 'a minute mark of truth in the narrative.' Who indeed can doubt it? But then why weave figments of imagination in matters where we can know nothing?

²⁰ θυμομαχῶν Τυρ.] Not, 'was at war,' as many Expositors render, since that involves all but an impossibility, but, as E. V. 'was highly displeased with,' or rather 'was deeply incensed against;' though the passages of Diod. Sic. and Polyb., adduced by Commentators, will not prove that sense; nor will Phot. Them. cited by Robins., Lex. I cannot find any passage that does, except Dion. Hal. Ant. v. 11, Κολλάτινος παραιῶν μὴ θυμομαχεῖν (sc. college), 'to bear a hostile mind towards;' the phrase just after, ᾗτουντο εἰρήνην (which caused the mistake), is best taken in a figurative sense for 'they sought to be friends with.' Comp. Pa. lv. 21, 'having war (hostility) in his heart' ἔχ. γγ. Kuinoel, with great probability, traces the origin of this misunderstanding to commercial jealousies, arising from Herod's having formed so admirable a port at Caesarea; whence, too, might arise commercial regulations prejudicial to their interest.—Ὁμοθυμαδὸν, 'conjointly,' i. e. both Tyrians and Sidonians.—Πείσαντες Βλάστον. The full sense is, 'having prevailed on Bl. [to give them his influence in the business].' See Matt. xxviii. 14. Gal. i. 10.

— διὰ τὸ τρέφεσθαι] 'was supplied with corn,' &c. For the country of Tyre and Sidon being but a narrow strip of sandy and infertile land, and thickly peopled, they were dependent for many of the necessaries of life on the interior

country ; which being in the possession of Herod, he could deprive them of that support, or make them pay for it at a very dear rate.

21. τακτῆρ] 'appointed,' as the day of public audience. So Dionys. Hal. ii. 74, τακτῆρ ἡμέρα. It appears from Jos. Antt. xiii. 8, 2, to have been the second day of the Games then celebrating in honour of Caesar; on which occasion he was, as described in the words of the historian, indeed royally attired: πολλὴν ἰνδυσμένον ἐξ ἀργύρου πειπνιμένην πᾶσαν, ὡς βασιλευσὶν ὕφην εἶναι: παρηλθόντες δὲ τὸ θέατρον ἀρχομένους ἡμέρας, ἰδὼν αὐτὴν πρῶτα τῶν ἡλικιωτῶν ἀκτίων ἐπιβολαῖε ὁ ἀργυρὸς κατανασθῆναι, βασιλεῖσι δὲ στίλβειν.—βημα, 'suggessus,' presenting the appearance of a throne, in the theatre, where Herod walked the games and delivered the oration.

— πρὸς αὐτοὺς] Not the people, as some imagine, but the ambassadors; which is required by what precedes; and δημιουργοῖν, as often in the later writers signifies simply 'to deliver a speech.'

22. ὁ δῆμος] The multitude chiefly, if not exclusively, Gentiles (many of whom inhabited Cæsarea), and set on, as we find from Josephus by the courtiers and flatterers, who, he tells us, did really profess to regard Herod as a god; no doubt in that qualified sense in which the Roman Emperors were called Divi, not only after their death, but even in their lifetime, and in which the Greeks sometimes applied the term to great personages (see Pind. Olymp. v. sub init. Aristid. iii. 249, 250. Eunap. Proem. p. 120, 163. Appian. i. 635. Josephus. p. 533, ult.); but yet in such a sense as the Jews could not receive; and it clearly appears from Josephus, that they were incensed with him for receiving this impious adulation.

23. ἐπάταξε] i. e. 'struck him with disease.' The expression ἄγγελος Κυρίου ἐπάτ., must, at any rate, mean that the disorder was inflicted by a Divine judgment (comp. χεῖρ Κυρίου, infra xiii. 11), and not, as some recent foreign Commentators say, brought on by dysentery arising from a cold caught. As to the circumstance of his thus becoming a prey to worms, it is by no means such as to prove the disorder to have been of human origin; for Divine power is continually found to act by second causes. And this will sufficiently reconcile the seeming discrepancy between the present account and that of Josephus. The historian narrates the secondary causes of Herod's death; the sacred writer considers the primary one, even the immediate judicial infliction from on High. The same principle will hold good whether we take ἄγγελος literally or metaphorically; though, even thus, taking it of the real, but invisible, agency of a celestial spirit; see 2 Sam. xxiv. 16. 2 Kings xix. 35. Nor is there any discrepancy as to the secondary cause of his death, namely, the disorder of which he died. For although Josephus only mentions a most violent pain in the stomach (διακρόνον ἔσχεν ὀδύνην), and dysentery, yet that is very consistent with St. Luke's account; since the dysentery might very well be occasioned by worms; especially as, in such a case, the disease is preceded by violent pains in the bowels; see Thucyd. ii. 49, 6. It is not certain, however, that Josephus meant to describe the disorder called dysentery. Possibly in the expressions ἀλγίαται τῆς γαστρὸς and ἀλγῆμα κοιλίας there may be reference to the agony occasioned by worms eating the bowels. So in 2 Macc. ix. 5, it is said of Antiochus (who confessedly died σκωληκόβρωτος), ἔλαβεν αὐτὸν ἀνέκιστος τὸν σπλάγχυνον ἀλγῆσαν, καὶ πικρὰ τῶν ἰνῶν βάσανοι. That Josephus has made no mention of worms may be attributed to motives of delicacy; especially as many tyrants, even the first Herod, had died of that, or a similar disorder, the morbus pedicularis; as, for instance, Antiochus Epiphanes, who had likewise arrogated Divine honours, and, like some others, had come to this miserable end; see Josephus, Antt. xvii. 6, 5. Euseb. Eccl. viii. 16. Hdot. iv. 205, and other passages adduced by Wetstein. Alf., I find, takes the same view of that I have done; and remarks that 'the σκωληκόβρ. affords another additional particular, and one to be expected from a physician.' It is plain, however, from Josephus's manner, that he regarded Herod's death as brought on by Divine infliction. Thus he says that the exclamations of the adulators were οὐδὲ ἱκεῖναι πρὸς ἀγαθόν. And he represents Herod himself as avowing his persuasion, that his death was a dispensation of Almighty Providence, to give the lie, as it were, to the impious assertions of the flattering multitude, and to punish him for accepting them. 'It is remarkable,' says Alf., 'that Josephus seems not to have been aware that one object of Herod's appearance was, to give an answer to the Sidonians' embassy; and he pays a just compliment to the accuracy of detail in Luke's narrative.' I cannot help thinking that Herod's speech was addressed to the multitude present, as well as to the ambassadors, who probably got little more than a few civil words, expressive of his granting their request, and restoring the amity between the two countries. It should seem that the introduction of, and Herod's reception of, the Sidonian ambassadors was a business very subordinate to the rest of that which occupied the day; and therefore Josephus, though aware of it, did not mention it. It cannot be denied that Eusebius' misquotation of Josephus' words narrating this remarkable occurrence has much of the appearance of a pious fraud, such as may be highly censurable in itself, but not more so than some others that are found in ancient Fathers, Greek and Latin; lapses, however, which have not been destructive of their reputation or trustworthiness. Accordingly, I cannot but consider it unjust, and uncalled for, in Mr. Alf. to issue a caution to his readers, as to 'how much they may believe of Eusebius' quotations of authors which do not remain to us.' For myself, I must avow that this lapse,—taken in itself, and admitting of extension from good intention,—does not shake my confidence generally in the Ecclesiastical Historian's fidelity and trustworthiness in his almost innumerable citations from important writers, which only remain to us in those quotations. That the stroke of disease was inflicted by the Lord through the instrumentality of an angel, we have the Sacred writer's assurance; and the case is parallel to those in the Old Test., 2 Kings xix. 35. 1 Chron. xxi. 15, 16; but the appearance of the angel was unnecessary, and ought not to have been obtruded by Eusebius.

— ἀνὸς ὃν οὐκ ἴδωκε τὴν δόξαν τ. Θε.] 'wherefore, because he did not leave to God the honour due to him alone,' but arrogated it to himself, at least by accepting the impious flattery of the people. Τὴν, not found in several MSS., Fathers, and Editions, has been cancelled by Matthæi, Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., and Tisch., ed. 1; but restored in Tisch., ed. 2, rightly. The phrase is found often without it; as Luke xvii. 18, and John ix. 24, and often in the Sept. But though the phrase in ascriptions of Divine honour seems not even to admit of it, yet it may always be employed with the force of renewed mention; which, I apprehend, is the case here; q. d. 'the Divine honour he had been accepting.' So in Rev. iv. 11, we have ἄξιός ἐστι, Κύριε, λαβεῖν τὴν δόξαν καὶ τὴν τιμὴν, where in τὴν there is a reference to the preceding ὅταν δώσουσι δόξαν καὶ τιμὴν. Now there the phrase has not the Article, because there is no reference.

XIII. Henceforward, to the end of this book, are solely—except at chap. xv.—recorded the various journeys and ministrations of St. Paul, and also his personal history in various events of his life. There is narrated in this chapter, and xiv. 1—28, Paul's first missionary journey, accompanied by Barnabas.

1. τινες here is absent from A, C, D, and a few cursives, with some Versions, and is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and also by Alf., who pronounces that 'the word was interpolated, to make it appear that the persons mentioned were not the only prophets and teachers in Antioch.' But that insertion for such a reason is unlikely; and that it should have been introduced into all the copies but some dozen (for I cannot find it in one of the Lamb., Mus., and Trin. Coll. copies) is exceedingly improbable. It was, I doubt not, partly omitted by accident, and partly removed by Critics; since both its use and its position are unclassical. Tis has in other passages been removed from that cause; see Matt. xxi. 28, 33. Mark v. 25, γυνὴ τις οὕσα ἐν ῥύσει. xiv. 47. Luke vii. 18. xix. 15. Acts xxviii. 3. I need scarcely say that the authority of ancient Versions is of slender weight in such a case.

— προφῆται] See note supra xi. 27.

— διδάσκαλοι] Meaning those endowed with the χάρισμα διδασκαλίας, mentioned at 1 Cor. xii. 28, and alluded to at Eph. iv. 11.

— Μαναὴν] Hebr. מנחם, consoler. Supposed to be the son of the Esæene who foretold to Herod, when a boy, that he would live to be a king.

— Ἡρώδου] That this was Herod Antipæa, and not (as Grotius supposes) Agrippa the second, son of king Agrippa the first, whose death was recorded at xii. 23, has been fully proved by Walch.

— σύντροφοι] This is properly an adjective, signifying 'brought up with,' but it is also, as here, used as a substantive, equivalent to our foster-brother, and is explained by ὁμογάλακτος in the Glossaries. But the sense foster-brother sometimes implied also that of table-fellow and school-fellow; and it was not unusual in ancient times for children to be brought up with the sons of kings and great men.

2. λειτουργούντων αὐτῶν τῷ Κυρ.] This term in the Old Test., and sometimes in the New (as Heb. x. 11), denotes the ministration of the Priests in their public services. Here it denotes the discharge of all the public duties of the Christian ministry, in reading the Word of God, and preaching the Gospel. The addition of καὶ νηστευόντων seems to point at more than usual solemnity, when (as infra xiv. 23) fasting was added to prayer; doubtless to pray for a blessing on the mission now taken in hand to the Gentiles. In the expression εἶπε here (meaning, through one of the prophets preaching) and ἐκπεμφθ. ὑπὸ τ. Πν. τ. ἁγ. at ver. 4, the Personality and Divinity of the Holy Spirit are plainly implied.

— ἀφορίσατε δὴ μοι] Ἀφορίζειν signifies, 1. to separate; 2. (by implication) to dedicate; 3. to appoint, as here. With reference to this, St. Paul, Rom. i. 1, calls himself ἀφορισμένος. The δὴ is hortative, and may be rendered now; as in Luke ii. 15. Acts xv. 36. 1 Cor. vi. 20. The μοι has the same force (meaning 'agreeably to my desire'), as at Pa. cxviii. 19, ἀνοίξατέ μοι πύλας. Thucyd. v. 10, τὰς πύλας ἀνοίγειν ἐμοί. Eurip. Iph. Aul. 1340, διαχαλατὲ μοι μέλαθρα. Soph. Œd. Col. 1475. Lucian i. 718, 645. The προς in προσκέκλημαι is not pleonastic, but signifies unto, as if it were written πρὸς ὃ κέκλημαι. Accordingly, it was, as Alf. says, a new fasting and a special prayer for Barnabas and Saul. On the practice of solemn prayer and fasting at certain seasons in the Church, see Bingham's Antiqq. iv. 6, 6.

6. Before τινα Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. insert ἄνδρα, with A, B, C, D, E, and a few cursives; to which, however, I can only add two Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16. The reading is worthy of attention, but not of adoption; since we may more easily account for its insertion than for its removal.

— μάγον] See note supra viii. 9.—Ψευδο-προφ. Meaning one who falsely claims to speak under Divine inspiration, whether in foretelling future events, or in making known the will of God. Ὅλην is received before νῆσον by Griesbach, Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from MSS. A, B, C, D, E, and a few cursives; to which I can only add one,—Trin. Coll. B, x. 16. And the evidence of Versions and Fathers is, in a case like this, any thing but weighty. Internal evidence is quite against the word, which has every appearance of coming from the margin, being intended to point out the full force of the δια in διελθ., which means throughout; for in passing from Seleucia to Paphos, they would traverse almost the whole length of the island from East to West. Alf., indeed, pronounces that ὅλην was removed to prevent an inconsistency; ὅλην and ἄχρι Πάφ. being supposed to be inconsistent. But how could that be? since the course the Apostles took would carry them along the whole length of the island; by sea to Salamis, and by land from Salamis to Paphos.—New-Paphos, now called Ktima. It is utterly incredible that such a stupid blunder could be committed almost universally. The insertion in a few MSS., and the expression of the sense in some Versions, is easy to be accounted for.

7. ἀνθυπάτῳ] Supposed by Grot. and Hamm. to be applied, by an error of title, for ἀντιστρατήγῳ. But Lardner and Kuin. have vindicated the accuracy of the expression; proving, by reference to Dio Cass. and other writers, that those who presided over the provinces by the appointment of the Senate (and Cyprus was then of that number, though it had once been Prætorian) were styled Proconsuls, though they had never filled the chair. That the title did really belong to the Roman governors of Cyprus, has been placed beyond all doubt by Engel, in his Kypros, Berlin, 1843, i. p. 459—463, who adduces, besides some coins, several inscriptions, taken from Boeck, Corp. Inscript.; the principal of each may be seen in Conybeare's and Howson's Life of St. Paul, vol. i. chap. 5.

— ἀνδρὶ συνετῷ] The term συνετός properly signifies 'sagaci,' 'intelligent by natural sagacity;' but here it bears that sense well represented by the rendering of the Vulg., virò prudenti, 'a man of discretion and wisdom,' meaning that practical wisdom necessary to one who governs. So Thucyd. i. 79, ἀνὴρ συνετός καὶ σώφρων. But Dr. Greenhill, in his Life of Galen, in Dr. Smith's Dictionary of Biography, has shown that the Sergius Paulus mentioned by Galen was another Sergius Paulus, who was ἑταρχος of Rome about A.D. 177, and one well versed in philosophy.

8. διαστρέψαι] At this term some Commentators stumble; and Valcknaer and Griesbach conjecture ἀποστρέψαι, but without any authority. The common reading is confirmed by a similar construction in Exod. v. 4, ἵνατί διαστρέφετε τὸν λαὸν ἀπὸ τῶν ἔργων; The reason for the apparent anomaly in syntax is, that there is a significatio prægriana,—namely, 'to pervert and turn,' i. e. to turn away from the faith, set him against it, by a perversion and misrepresentation of it.

9. ὁ καὶ Παῦλος] sub. καλούμενος. With respect to the name Παῦλος, it is well observed by Wets., that, though Luke has before invariably called him Saul, now, no sooner has he mentioned the name of Paul, than Saul becomes so obliterated, that we no where find it used again, either by Luke, Peter, or Paul, in his Epistles. For this the Commentators are not a little perplexed to account. Some suppose that the Apostle had always borne both names. But then why should Luke have hitherto invariably used the name Saul, and now as invariably that of Paul? Others are of opinion that Saul changed his name after his conversion. But that is refuted by his being called Saul by Luke after Πνεύματος ἁγίου, καὶ ἀτενίσας εἰς αὐτόν, ¹⁰ «εἶπεν ὁ πληρὴς παντὸς δόλου καὶ πάσης ραδιουργίας, υἱὲ Διαβόλου, ἐχθρὲ πάσης δικαιοσύνης! οὐ παύσῃ διαστρέφων τὰς ὁδοὺς Κυρίου τὰς εὐθείας; ¹¹ καὶ νῦν ἰδοὺ, χεῖρ [τοῦ] Κυρίου ἐπὶ σέ, καὶ ἔσθι τυφλὸς, μὴ βλέπων τὸν ἥλιον, ἄχρι καιροῦ. that time, and up to the present. Saul must have himself changed his name; not, however, as some imagine, out of humility, and in deference to the Proconsul, but rather (as Beza, Grot., Doddr., and Kuin. suppose), because he was now brought very much among Greeks and Romans, to whom the name Saul was unknown; while that of Paul was familiar, and, as being a Roman name, would be so much the more suitable to a Roman citizen. And as the reason for the alteration, on taking the solemn charge he had now received, would be stronger than ever, there can be no doubt that it was now made; in conformity, indeed, with a Jewish practice, as old, at least, as the Captivity, of adopting a Gentile name. This Conybe. and Howson ably trace through the Persian period, and the Roman, and the Middle Ages, downwards.

— πλῆρης Πν. ἁγ.] 'filled with the influence and inspiration of the Holy Spirit;' said, that it might not be supposed that this address was uttered under the impression of spleen. I cannot agree with Calv., that this excoecentia ardor (as he terms it) was resorted to because he expected that no good would be done by a more moderate and placid mode of address. It should rather seem that, as Olshaus. supposes, this severe oburgation was intended as a wholesome severity, to bring Elymas to a due consciousness of his guilt, and a true repentance; for which reason probably it was that the judicial infliction was announced to him as only temporary, thus leaving him, as yet, a locus penitentiae. I cannot see any ground for adopting the view taken by the Bishop of Winchester and Mr. Alford, that the expression ἀτενίσας εἰς has reference to some peculiarity in Paul's sight, which rendered his bodily presence contemptible, arising, Alford thinks, from Paul's never having perfectly recovered his sight after the δόξα τοῦ φωτός ἔκειντο. But this is taking too much for granted, and is a mere figment of fancy. Besides, the same expression recurs at xxiii. 1, where it can only have the sense that has hitherto been ascribed to it, 'fixing his eyes full upon' him; though I am not indisposed to discern in it the graphical touch of an eye-witness.—On ραδιουργίας see my Lex. It may here be rendered by 'clever roguery,' which will well designate the conduct of Elymas.

10. διαστρέφων τὰς ὁδοὺς Κυρίου τὰς εὐθείας:] It is somewhat debated whether τὰς ὁδοὺς Κυρίου should be understood as denoting the Lord's religion, or the ways and purposes of the Lord. The latter sense is preferable, since, as used in the former signification, the word is always in the singular; and indeed εὐθείας would thus be an expression little suitable. Render: 'misrepresenting the upright counsels and purposes of the Lord (lit., modes of proceeding) [for the salvation of men according to the Gospel system].' Here there is a tacit contrast between the conduct of the God of truth, 'just and right' (Deut. xxxii. 4), and that of the liar and impostor, Elymas, who was 'perverse and crooked in all his ways;' for it would seem, from the οὐ παύσῃ, that the charge was founded not only on his present conduct, but on his previous course of deceit and imposture towards his fellow men, on account of which he might well be called υἱὲ Διαβόλου, as practising the deceit and fraud of the 'Grand Impostor.'

11. ἰδοὺ] As we say, 'Mind! take notice!' — Χεῖρ τοῦ Κυρίου ἐπὶ σέ. A Hebrew phrase, denoting that Divine punishment is suspended over a person. See Exod. ix. 3. Job xix. 21.

— ἔσθι τυφλὸς, μὴ βλ. τ. ἥ.] This is thought to be a Hebrew mode of asserting the same thing, both by affirmation and by negation of the contrary. But the idiom occurs also in the Greek and Latin writers, and is only a relic of primitive simplicity of diction. It does not involve pleonasm, for the latter phrase serves to explain and strengthen the former; as in a kindred passage of Luke i. 20, καὶ ἰδοὺ, ἔσθι σιωπῶν, μὴ δυνατόν σοι λαλῆσαι. Here, however, μὴ βλέπων τὸν ἥλιον is so much stronger an expression than τυφλὸς (for all but persons born blind have some faint view of the sun), that there is a sort of emphaz, and we might render freely, 'thou shalt be blind—yea, stone blind!' Of ἄχρι καιροῦ the literal sense is, 'during some time.' Though, as duration for a certain time only necessarily implies termination at the end of that time, so ἄχρι χρόνου may be popularly taken for μήχρι χρόνου; q. d. 'for a season, to terminate at a certain time.' But although the words of the Apostle express no more than this,—yet, as καιροῦ is used (which chiefly signifies a point of time), not χρόνου, he meant, I apprehend, to hint at that sense which might be more correctly phrased by μήχρι καιροῦ; meaning by καιροῦ the time of his repentance and reformation. Whether that time would ever arrive, the Apostle, it seems, knew not; the Holy Spirit not having informed him. And he felt so much doubt, that he only just uses an expression which might fall short of driving the man into despair.

— ἐπέπεσεν ἐπ' αὐτὸν ἀχλὺς καὶ σκότος:] Passing by the vain speculations of the Rationalists on the subject of this blindness, I would only observe, that there is here not a Hendiadys; but it should seem that the supervention of the blindness is graphically described, by various stages of the disease. First, a cloud or mist came over his eyes, such as that which obscures the sight of the dying (see Hom. II. v. 696. xvi. 344). This soon increased to darkness; which terminated in that 'total eclipse in which the sun is dark!'

In the next words, περιάγων ἰζήται χειραγωγόν, lit. 'and going up and down, he went in search of a guide;' we have a graphic description, in its different stages, from the hand of a physician, of total blindness, as in Artemid. On. i. 50, τυφλοὺν ἵποισεν, ἵνα (so that) χειραγωγοῖς χρῆσονται. This use of περιάγ. is rare, but it is found in Cebes, p. 64, ὅρας ὡς περιάγονται αὐτούς; Liban., περιῆγε πλανώμενος ἐν Ἀθήναις; and a grammarian, in Hermann's Gramm. Gr., explains περιάγει by περιέρχεται. There may be an ellipse of ἱαυτόν, expressed in Plut. Solon. 6. The words ἐκπλησσύμενος—Κυρίου are meant further to unfold the sense couched in ἰδὼν τὸ γιν. with reference to the miracle, and may be freely rendered, 'being amazed at this [authoritative] mode of teaching the Lord,' i. e. his religion; and espec. 'when he saw its truth confirmed by such power [of miracles].' For it is not (what some have supposed) the internal evidence of the truth which is here had in view, but its external evidence. This, indeed, is placed beyond doubt by the authentic interpretation of St. Luke himself, in his Gospel, iv. 32, καὶ ἐξεπλήσσοντο ἐπὶ τῇ διδαχῇ ὅτι ἐν ἱερωσίᾳ ἦν ὁ λόγος αὐτοῦ. The result of this full conviction is stated simply by the term ἐπίσταναι, 'he became a believer;' as did many others. And thus, as Conyb. observes, this blinding of the false prophet opened the Proconsul's eyes to the truth as it is in Jesus; and what had been intended as a hindrance to the Gospel proved, under Providence, the means of its extension.

¹⁴ διελθόντες ἀπὸ—] Not, 'when they departed—they came,' but 'having passed through (the country),' 'having traversed' it. Comp. Luke xi. 24, διέρχεται διὰ ἀνδρῶν. There seems an allusion to the difficulties of the country thus traversed, in steep mountainous ascents, and on the contrary in narrow defiles, or in morasses; or in the not less difficulty and danger in passing the numerous rapid rivers, the Cestius and Eurymedon and their tributaries, which run in all directions, and obstruct the roads; not to mention a more formidable difficulty of travelling, from the savage barbarousness of the inhabitants, mostly robbers; for, as Conyb. and Hows. remark, and prove by competent authority, 'the lawless and marauding habits of the population of the mountains which skirt the table-land of the interior of Asia Minor, from the plains on the south coast, were notorious. From the matter adduced by Conyb. and Hows., it would seem that Paul had chiefly in mind, the 'perils of rivers—perils of robbers—perils in the deserts,' which he experienced in this his first Missionary progress.

—Ἀντιόχειαν τῆς Πισιδίας] Situated, as Strabo says, on a hill; but whose true situation was long unknown, until at length it was fixed by Mr. Arundel, in his Travels, at a place called Jalolabet.

¹⁵ ἀπέστειλαν] The rulers sent, from their own πρωτοκαθεδρία, to the two Jewish strangers,—sitting among the congregation, occupying the lower seats, and on whom, we may imagine, many eyes had been turned,—desiring to know whether (as they had been teaching in the city) they had any word of exhortation or admonition to deliver to the people; and, if so, to furnish it. Comp. Luke iv. 17—20, and see notes; also xv. 3, and 2 Thessa. ii. 3.

¹⁶—⁴¹. We have here, doubtless, if not the whole speech delivered by Paul, yet the full substance of it; and no mere outline, or dry analysis. Luke has (as Conyb. and Hows. well observe) evidently preserved, if not all the words, yet the very words, delivered by the Apostle; nor can we fail to recognize in all these speeches a tone of thought, and even of expression, which stamps them with the individuality of the speaker. The speech naturally resolves itself into three divisions; or rather two, and an application. I. The Apostle 'reminds his hearers of the former mercies of God to the family of Abraham, the deliverances of his people, and the prediction that their Messiah should be descended from David; and asserts that this Messiah was Jesus of Nazareth, the promised Son of David.' II. He adverts to, and accounts for, the rejection of the Jews at large, notwithstanding the attestation of his Messiahship by God himself in raising him from the dead. III. He subjoins an application of the foregoing, intended for all present, announcing to them the great doctrine of Justification by Faith (which, as Conyb. says, 'might stand as a summary, representing, in outline, the early Chapters of the Epistle to the Romans'), and ends with a solemn warning against that bigoted rejection of the Gospel of Christ, which the latter part of the address might call forth.

16. κατὰ τῇ χειρὶ] Thus motioning for silence. It was, indeed, Paul's custom to commence speech with some such motion as that in question.

—οἱ φοβ. τὸν Θεόν] By these are meant the uncircumcised proselytes of the gate,—the οἱ σιθόμενοι προσήλυτοι, infra ver. 43, and οἱ σιθόμενοι Ἕλληνες, xvii. 17. So Joseph. Antt. xiv. 7, 2, makes a similar distinction between Ἰουδαῖοι and σιθόμενοι. It may be meant to include (Mr. Alf. thinks it does) even such pious (worshippers of the one true God) Gentiles, as were not proselytes in any sense. At any rate, the speech is universal in its application.—After τ. λαοῦ τούτου, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. cancel Ἰσραὴλ from E, G, H, and about 50 cursives (to which I can add almost all the Lamb. and Mus. copies), and several Versions. But internal evidence draws two ways—for the word may have been introduced from a marginal Scholium, or it may have been removed by Critics as inlegant and unnecessary; and this is confirmed by the other alterations, all tending to remove a fancied superfluity. Accordingly, the word must not be expunged. In τὸν λαὸν ἠψώσεν there seems an allusion to Ia. i. 2, υἱοὶ ἰσραὴλ καὶ ἠψώσα, and the sense is, 'raised them into a numerous people.' So Eccles. xlv. 21, ἀνιψώσαι is interchanged with πληθύναι, and both used of the people of Israel at the hands of God.

18. ἐτροφοφόρησεν] It is a point of no little difficulty to determine which of the two readings here found (ἐτροφοφόρησεν, the text. rec., or ἐτροφοφόρησεν) is to be adopted in the copies. The Editors and Critics are divided in opinion; but the greater number, and the more eminent for critical acumen, decide in favour of ἐτροφ. Many arguments have been expended by the disputants on both sides, either irrelevant or inconclusive, which only increase the difficulty, at least of weighing the external evidence. That the words are, as might be expected, from the usual interchange of π and φ in pronunciation, confounded by the scribes; and that both words were in use, at least in the ordinary Greek, is hardly to be questioned; for, though we might doubt whether τροφοφορίε be analogically formed, yet we must bend to the 'norma loquendi;' and the similar form διτροφοφορίε countenances the seeming anomaly. That τροφοφ. is boni commatis, is attested by its occurring also in Deut. i. 31, in 2 Macc. vii. 27, and in Macarius, Homil. 46, and so τροφοφόροι in Eustathius. External evidence, indeed, is so decidedly in favour of ἐτροφ., that if that were all we had to consider, it ought to be preferred. Internal evidence, however, is likewise to be taken into the account, and that is quite in favour of ἐτροφ. It is the less usual and more difficult term, and is far more suitable to the context; ἐτροφοφ. consorting far better with ἠψώσεν and ἐξήγαγεν before. Thus the inferiority in external testimony; and, accordingly, this knotty point might remain undecided ad Græcos culendas, were we not enabled to call in another principle, which may serve to turn the scale. No unprejudiced inquirer can doubt that the Apostle had in view Deut. i. 31 (Sept.); nay, Bengel, Kuin., and Stier, with much probability, conjecture that Deut. i. and Ia. i. were the two chapters of the Old Test. which had been read that day in the synagogue, as they are at present on one and the same Sabbath. But, upon inspecting the passage, it will be obvious that τροφοφορίε, and not τροποφορίε, was there the term employed. It is supported by 5-6ths of the MSS., and by Symm. and Aquila, and is required there by the context. Moreover, the great bulk of the MSS., and the Hebrew original, require that we should read, not τροποφοροῖσι, but ἐτροφοφόρησι, as the Apostle seems to have read.—'Ετροφοφόρησι is also confirmed by Numb. xi. 12 (Sept.). Λάβει αὐτὸν (scil. τὸν λαὸν τούτου) εἰς τὸν κόλπον σου, ὥστε ἂν αἰσθῇ τὸν θλαζόμενον, εἰς τὴν γῆν ἣν ἔρωςας τοὶ πατέρες αὐτῶν: for it is probable that this passage too was in the mind of the Apostle, and that the two passages contain respectively images of a father carrying his little son over the rough places of a road, and of a nurse carrying an infant in her bosom. There, I conceive, the image terminates, and does not extend to feeding, which some ancient Interpreters seem to have recognized in the present passage, as we may infer from the Const. Apost. vii. 36, Hesych., and the Peshito Syriac, Arabic, Coptic, Æthiopic, and Italic Versions. I acknowledge, indeed, that the reading might justly be regarded as an open question, since ἐτροφ. is not, as some say, unsuitable to the context, but the reverse; and the argument advanced against ἐτροφ.—that God did not very patiently suffer the perversity of the Israelites,—that argument has little or no force; for it may be said that, upon the whole, God was long-suffering, as is clear from Numb. xiv. 18, and not a few other passages that might be adduced. Nay, when in Ps. xc. 11, it is said, 'Forty years was I grieved with this generation,' there seems imparted to the verb γν an implied notion of long-suffering endurance, even unto utter weariness. Indeed, one might also say that ἐτροφ. is equally suitable to the context. But, since it cannot be doubted that Paul meant to allude to the passage of Deut., the argument as to comparative suitability is effectually cut short, and the question decided in favour of ἐτροφ., which has been adopted by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch. 1, and Alf. In his 2nd Edit., indeed, Tisch.

has restored ἔτροφ.; but his second thoughts are, here at least, not wiser. It could not arise from any fresh light that has broken in, but from his constant proneness to bow to the weight of external authority, to the neglect of internal evidence; exactly as in the case of Matthæi, who says, 'vehementer arripit hæc lectio (ἔτροφ.), sed nihil muto contra tot codices;' and I must confess that I have not been able to add even one to the seven cursives which alone have ἔτροφ. Nevertheless, the defect is made up by the authority (in a case like this, weighty) of the ancient Versions—the Pesh. Syr., Arab., Copt., Sahid., Æthiop., Slav.; with several Fathers, as Athanasius, Cyrill. Macarius; and, I add, the Const. Apost. vii. 36, for although we there read διὰ ξηραὺς αὐτοὺς παρήγαγε, καὶ ἔτροποφόρησας αὐτοὺς ἐν ἐρήμῳ παντοίοις ἀγαθοῖς, yet the context evidently demands ἔτροφ. However, I do not doubt that when the cursives shall have been all collated, with diligence and accuracy, —hitherto a very rare excepsio,—some will be found to have ἔτροφ., or to have had it originally.

19. κατακληρονόμησεν] Such (for the vulg. κατακληροδοτήσιν) is the reading of almost all the most ancient uncials, and not a few cursives, including all the Lamb. and Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16, and several Fathers; which has been adopted by almost every Critic and Editor of note: and justly; for though κατακληροδοτή is the less usual term, and therefore the other might seem a gloss, yet its authority is not very well established. It is found, indeed, in the LXX.; but there, too, the most ancient and correct copies have κατακληρον. It is plain that ἐκκληροδοτ. was an alteration by those Critics who were ignorant of the rather rare transitive sense of κατακληρον.

20. ὡς ἔτεσι τιτρ. καὶ π.] As to the discrepancy between this number and that at 1 Kings vi. 1, we need not suppose an error either in one or the other, though the Apostle's number is confirmed by Josephus; but we may (with Canon Townsend) take the words to mean, 'and after these things, which lasted about the space of 450 years, he gave them judges, until Samuel the Prophet,' i. e. from the time that God chose the fathers (which some fix to the birth of Isaac), to the time the land was divided to them by lot, was nearly 450 years; and then God appointed judges in Israel. However, I am now inclined to agree with Alf., 'that Paul followed a chro-nology then current among the Jews, and agreeing with the book of Judges itself, and that adopted by Josephus, but not with our present Hebrew text.'

22. εὗρον—θελήματά μου] This is not a regular quotation, but gives the substance, with a slight modification, of what is said of David, 1 Sam. xiii. 14, and Ps. lxxxix. 20, the matter of both being blended together; which was very allowable, the words of both passages being alike spoken under prophetic inspiration.

—ἄνδρα κατὰ τ. καρδίαν μ.] viz. in his undeviating pursuit of the plans God would have carried into effect, and in accomplishing his purposes. For καρδία here signifies mind, or purpose. Nor is this use merely (as it has been thought) a Hebraism; since in Æschyl. Agam. 9 we have ὡς γὰρ κρατεῖ γυναικὸς ἀνδρόβουλον, ἰλπίζον, κέαρ, 'for thus the masculine mind obtained its hoped-for purpose.'

—ὃς ποιήσει πάντα τὰ θελήματά μου] Render: 'who will perform all my behests, i. e. all belonging to God's will or wish, expressed or understood. The plural is not found in the Class. writers, nor elsewhere in the N. T., except Eph. ii. 3. It occurs, however, in Sept. Pa. xv. 2. cii. 7. cx. 2.

23. Paul now appeals to the fulfilment of prophecy, in the sending of Christ, and his forerunner John the Baptist, to Jews and Proselytes; JESUS is proclaimed as the promised MESSIAH. The promise especially adverted to is in Zech. iii. 9, Sept., ἰδοὺ, ἐγὼ ἄγω τὸν δούλόν μου Ἀνατολήν. So Luke i. 78, ἀνατολὴ ἐξ ὕψους. Comp. Mal. iv. 2. I have partly been induced by this passage of Zech. to receive, with Griesb., Matth., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., the reading ἡγάγα for ἡγάρι, which would otherwise be called for both by strong external authority (A, B, E, G, H, and many cursives, including not a few Lamb. and Mus. copies), and by internal evidence, as being the more difficult reading, and the other a plainer expression of the same sense, suggested by such passages as Judg. iii. 9, 15, ἐγείρισεν σωτῆρα, not to say that the αἰσόδου at the next verse ('entrance on his public course') calls for ἡγάριν.

24. προκηρύξαντος] The προ is not pleonastic; the term signifying 'to proclaim beforehand,' as a public crier does. So Joseph. Antt. x. 5, 1, Ἰεριμίας τὰ μέλλοντα τῇ πόλει δαυὰ προεκήρυξε.

I am not He, οὗτος, which on occasions like this is often, through reverence, left unexpressed.

26. Ἄνδρες ἀδελφοί, &c.] The Apostle now earnestly exhorts his hearers, whether Jews or proselytes of the gate, gladly to embrace the salvation offered to them through Christ, and thereby form a contrast to the case of the Rulers of Jerusalem, who, nevertheless, did not, in causing the death of Jesus, frustrate God's purpose, but only fulfilled the prophecies. The contrast is intimated in the ὑμῖν (placed for emphasis at the beginning of the clause), and in the γάρ, which is not, as Alf. says, causal, as supplying a reason, but is argumentative; q. d. 'for, as to the Rulers, they have only fulfilled the declarations of the Prophets.'

— For ἀπεστάλη, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit ἔλατ., from A, B, C, D, and 30 cursive MSS. (to which I add Lamb. 1182), perhaps rightly; for the compound was more likely to pass into the simple through the carelessness of the scribes, than the simple to have been altered to the compound by the Critics: ἀπιστ. could not be, as Alf. imagines, a critical alteration. The verb ἔλατ. occurs about twelve times in the New Test., and in ten of them in Luke; so that it is almost peculiar to Luke; though it often occurs in the Sept. In Luke xii. 11, we have the word as used of the mission of a messenger; and, as here it is used of the mission of the Gospel, so in Gal. iv. 6, it is used of the sending of the Holy Ghost, in the influence of the Spirit on the hearts of men, and his being sent forth from the Father through the Son. Thus the compound yields a fuller sense than the simple, and is therefore more likely to be the genuine reading, which, accordingly, I have now received.

27. τοῦτον ἀγνοήσαντες, &c.] In construing this sentence, we must take ἀγνοήσαντες as belonging to both τοῦτον and (by adaptation of signification) to τὰς φωνὰς τ. π., in the sense, 'not knowing him to be the Messiah, and not understanding the words of the prophecy.' At κρίναντες (for κατακρ.) supply αὐτόν, taken from τοῦτον preceding, and render, 'by condemning.' Ἀγνοήσαντες cannot be again supplied at ἐπλήρωσαν, yet it is implied; the meaning being, that 'they unwittingly fulfilled the prophecies.' So Joseph. (Bell. iv. 6, 3), advertising to such prophecies, says of the Zelotae, οἱ οὐκ ἀπιστήσαντες [I conjecture ἀπιστ.] διακόνου ἱαννοῦ ἐπίδοσαν.—By φωνὰς τῶν προφ. are simply meant 'the effata of the Prophets committed to writing;' of which Κύρκε adduces examples.

28. καὶ — εὐρόντες] 'and although they found.'

29. ἐτέλεσαν — ἴθηναν] Said of the same persons.

— καθελόντες ἀπὸ τοῦ, &c.] A difficulty has here been started; that the same persons did not bury Jesus who had condemned him. Bp. Middleton regards this as a trifling inaccuracy of expression, which the Apostle, hastening to the grand subject of the Resurrection, cared not to avoid. It may, however, be doubted whether there be any inaccuracy at all. It seems to be only a popular form of expression, by which any one is said to do what he procures or permits to be done by another. Those who brought about Christ's crucifixion might be familiarly said to bring him to his grave, though they did not deposit him there. What the Apostle meant to say is this,—that when they had, however unwittingly, done all that was predicted of him [up to his death], they had him taken down and buried [and thought there was then an end of him]. This last clause, though not expressed, is perhaps alluded to in the adverbial δε, which commences the next sentence, 'But not so;—God raised him,' &c.; there being an indirect contrast between what men did unto him and what God did for him by raising him from the dead.

31. δε ὥφθη ἰ. ἡμ. πλ.] This, and the subsequent words of the verse, are meant as an attestation of the fact just asserted of Jesus' Resurrection, as the seal of his Messiahship. As to the νῦν found before εἰσι in A, C, and 18 cursives (to which I add 2 Lamb. copies, and 1 Mus. copy, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16), with the Syr. and other ancient Versions, and adopted by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.,—and commended by Alf. and Conyb. as 'important, by giving peculiar force to the sentence;' q. d. moment his witnesses to the Jewish people,'—I cannot adopt it, because the external evidence for it is insufficient, and internal is quite against it; for how came it that a word, which gave such peculiar emphasis to a sentence, should come to be, as Alf. says, 'removed as unnecessary' in all the copies except a comparatively few? It is far more likely to have been inserted—especially in the Versions—to supply what seemed necessary to the sense, but in reality not so, as being implied in the αὐτῶν, regarded as emphatic. This is not the only passage where the νῦν has been introduced by the Critics; see Matt. xii. 32. Luke xxii. 18. John viii. 11. Acts xxvi. 17. Sometimes they remove the νῦν, as in Matt. xxvii. 43. John xvi. 32. Acts ii. 33.

Hebr. וַיְחַי Deut. xviii. 15), maintains that the context here requires it, for the following reasons derived from the masterly representation of Gataker in his Cinnus, c. v., as follows:— 'Cum duplex sit Christi ἐγερσις seu ἀνάστασις, altera incarnationis et missionis in mundum, altera resurrectionis e morte, utramque distinctim Apostolus tum prædicat, tum probat; priorem prædicat v. 23, probat 34, 35; ita quidem, ut posteriori probationem v. 34 priori opponat per adversativam ἔτι, quod absolum foret, si v. 32 et 34 de una eademque ἀνάστασει sermo esset. Scopus Apostoli non erat solum ostendere Christum a mortuis resuscitatum fuisse, sed quod in eo impleta sit omnis promissio Patribus facta de mittendo, suo tempore, Messiam, vid. v. 23, 32. Quis id credat, Paulum thema hoc principale, ubi ad probationem dictorum jam devenit, neglexisse? Uti ab ἄγειρ., v. 23, simpliciter posito, v. 30, distinguitur τὸ ἄγειρεν ἐκ νεκρῶν, ita et τὸ ἀναστήσας, v. 32, et τὸ ἀνάστηεν ἐκ νεκρῶν, v. 34, sollicite a se invicem distinguuntur, manifesto indicio, non eundem utriusque phrasæ sensum esse.'

³³ This verse must, of course, be interpreted according to the view taken of the foregoing. Those, who adopt the former view, maintain that Paul here refers the prophecy, in its full completion, to the resurrection of our Lord, comparing Rom. i. 4, ὁρισθίντος Υἱοῦ Θεοῦ—ἔξ ἀναστάσεως νεκρῶν. Those who adopt the latter take a view far more consistent with the true scope of the whole Psalm; and here the masterly note of Calvin is most apposite:— 'Quamvis ergo suscitari Christus a Deo cœperit, quando prodiit in mundum, resurrectio tamen quasi justa et plena suscitatio fuit: quia quum prius exinanitus esset forma servi accepta (Phil. ii. 7), tunc victor mortis et Dominus vitæ emersit, ut nihil ad majestatem Dei Filio et quidem unigenito dignam illi deesset.' Hoffm. also ably maintains the same view, and concludes his discussion with the words, 'Maneant ergo verba Υἱόν μου—γενήνηκά σε insigne testimonium de æterna Filii Dei generatione ex essentia Patris: cum vero additur σήμερον, quod de æternitate haud intelligi posse supra probavimus, id profecto innuere aliquid videtur, quod respectu generationis illius æternæ in tempore factum est, &c., manifestationem gloriæ Christi, ὡς μονογενοῦς ἀπὸ Πατρὸς, hæc enim et cum prima illa exhibitione connectitur Luc. i. 32, 35. Job. i. 14. Inest ergo huic oraculo locutio concisa, sic evolunda, 'Tu es Filius meus, ego te genui; idque hodie erat, quod ego te genuerim': ita Bengelius in Gnom. Favet huic expositioni, quod totus Psalmi contextus Christum non respicit, prout tanquam Filius Dei ab æterno apud Patrem erat, sed prout tanquam Messias, v. 2, in mundum venit, et per passionem consummatus Rex a Patre constitutus est, v. 6. Dominus omnium, v. 8, &c. The above view is confirmed by the authority of St. Cyril, ap. Catena. Oxon. 'Ὁρᾷ ἐναργῆ

34—36. That nothing new is now brought forward, and consequently that vv. 32, 33, cannot have reference to the resurrection of Jesus, is plain from the words ὅτι δι—οὕτως εἶρηκεν. Here, in confirmation of the resurrection of Jesus, as a fact predicted by the Prophets, Paul refers first to the passage cited from Is. lv. 3 (Sept.). 'The words ὅτι δώσω ὑμῖν are only added by Paul to bring the passage into connexion.' (Olah.) Paul, however, does not really add de suo the δώσω, but rather introduces it, as suggested by the preceding context as inherent in διαθήσασαι, &c., as Hoffm. shows. The Messianic reference of the passage cannot be doubted, because the words τῷ Ἰσραὴλ τὰ ὅσια Δαυὶδ τὰ πιστά can, notwithstanding the dissent of some Expositors, denote no other than 'the mercies' or 'benefits' sacredly assured by promise, the certain fulfilment of which is then declared. So the words must have been taken by the Pesch. Syr. Translator, and by St. Clement, who, on the Epistle to the Corinthians, ch. i., says (doubtless with allusion to the present passage), πόσα δι' αὐτῷ ὀφείλομεν ὅσια; 'How many benefits do we owe to him!' The above view of the meaning of Ἰσραὴλ, or ὅσια, is confirmed by Hoffm., p. 94, seqq., who, after showing that Ἰσραὴλ means properly 'gratiam,' 'benignitatem,' and also its result, explains Ἰσραὴλ by beneficia gratia, as in Gen. xxxii. 11. Pa. cvi. 7. Is. lxiii. 7. He then observes that the Sept. Translators have customarily rendered the word by ὅσια, though Symm. more correctly by τὰ ἔλξη. He, however, traces a correspondence between the two notions, however seemingly apart, in Him who is Ἰσραὴλ, gratiosus Dei; and he adds, 'Utique nil nisi Ἰσραὴλ gratias nobis a Deo polliceri possumus; id quod Paulus, Eph. i. 6, sic exprimit, Θεὸς ἐχαρίτωσεν ἡμᾶς ἐν τῷ ἡγαπαύειν.' He concludes by showing, that the above view is quite agreeable to the context. In short, the Apostle argues that these beneficia gratia were assured to David by the sacred promises of God. He goes on to show, that the gracious promises made to David must be sought in such passages as 2 Sam. vii. 12, &c. Pa. lxxix. 4, 5, 20—29, 35—37, where there is promised to him an eternal kingdom; of course, the complete fulfilment can only be sought in the Son of David, the MESSIAH, to which Scripture points in Is. ix. 7, comp. with Luke i. 32, 33. Amos ix. 11; comp. with Acts xv. 15; also 2 Sam. vii. 14, comp. with Heb. i. 5. He then concludes, by ably tracing the course of argument pursued by the Apostle.

36. The Apostle here intimates that the words of the Psalm, though spoken under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit by David, cannot have their fulfilment in David, and then leaves it to be inferred that the person there meant must be Jesus,—the only one who had been so raised from the dead, as not to return thither, or experience corruption, that which must result from permanent death, who must consequently be the MESSIAH promised to the Fathers. Ὑπηρετήσας must, as I have shown, be construed with τῇ βουλῇ, as representing David, 'the man after God's own heart,' as the instrument of Divine grace for founding the future kingdom of God in the Gospel of Christ. I still continue to take ἰδίᾳ γενεᾷ to mean 'in his own age,' which is confirmed by all the ancient Versions. Render: 'in his own age,' the period of existence assigned to him by God; which yields a sufficiently suitable sense; whereas the other, 'for his own age,' however specious (see Calv.), embarrasses the construction.

— προσετέθη πρὸς τοὺς π.] An expression derived from the Old Test. (as Gen. xlix. 29. xxv. 8. Judg. ii. 10), in which there is an allusion to those vast caves, or subterraneous vaults, in which the Hebrews (as also the Egyptians, Babylonians, and other Oriental nations) used to deposit the dead of a whole family, or race; sometimes arranged in recesses by the side of the vault, and sometimes laid upon each other, until the place was quite full of bodies.

38, 39. The Apostle now applies the doctrine which he has already stated and proved, and proceeds, by inference, to show the exceeding great and precious benefits to be obtained by faith in the Messiahship of Jesus, and to point out (at v. 38) the infinite superiority of the remission of sins to be attained through Him over that supplied by the law of Moses; after which (at v. 39) he proceeds to glance at the great doctrine of justification by faith, which he afterwards so completely set forth in his Epistles to the Romans and Galatians, and elsewhere. In fact, the term δικαιωθ. here is, strictly speaking, a carrying out of the doctrine of ἀφαισις διαπραγμάτων, so far as touching on justification only (as Mr. Alf. says) in its negative sense; since it does not here unfold that higher sense (for which his hearers were not yet prepared) of δικαιωθ., 'the accounting righteous,' whereby those who have that justification from God are δικαιοὶ ἐκ πί-στες.

40. To this encouragement to faith, intended for the well-disposed, the Apostle subjoins a warning,—meant for the refractory,—not to disregard, through unbelief, the invitation of God; which he seems to have anticipated they would do.—Ἐν τοῖς προφ. meaning, that division of the Old Test. called ‘the Prophets,’ or the Prophets in general; see note on John vi. 45.

41. Ἰδετε, &c. The words are derived from Habak. i. 5 (though a similar apostrophe in Isa. xxviii. 14 may have been in the mind of St. Paul), in which a word is omitted not necessary to the sense, and one or two supplied to make it clearer. Both the Apostle and the LXX. vary from the Hebrew, as regards καταφρονῆται and ἀφανίσθητε, in the former instance preserving the true reading, which seems to be not כָּנָה, but כָּנָה, which is read in some MSS., and confirmed by the Syriac and Arabic Versions. With ἀφαν. there is more of difficulty. The common version ‘perish’ is generally considered indefensible, as not even warranted by the Hebrew; and Beza, Dodd., Pearce, Wakef., Schleus., Wahl, and Kuin., render ‘disappear,’ viz. for shame and fear; Bengel, colorem amittite, ‘lose your colour,’ ‘grow pale with stupor;’ which is, at least, preferable to the former. But it is so forced and frigid, that it seems better to retain the ordinary interpretation, ‘perish,’ ‘come to destruction,’ perhaps with allusion to the suddenness and completeness of the destruction, so as to be seen and heard of no more. Comp. Lysias, p. 191, 27, ἀφανίσθαι ἐξ ἀνθρώπων. Polyb. xxxiv. 146. There is no objection to this in the fact, that there is nothing corresponding to the word in the Sept., or the Hebrew; since this cannot properly be termed a citation of the passage from the Prophet, but, as Calvin well saw, an accommodation of the words of the Prophet by Paul to his present use: ‘quia (he adds) sic ut semel minatus fuerat Deus per prophetam, ita etiam,’ &c., and that, as Dr. Henderson remarks, on account of the exact similarity of the Jews in his days, both as regards the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and the utter incredulity of the nation at large as to that event. Hence it would seem that Paul threw in this expression, in order the more forcibly to urge the warning on his unbelieving hearers. If this view be adopted, I would point Ἰδετε—καὶ θαυμάσατε—καὶ ἀφανίσθητε!—ὅτι—‘Yea, perish by your obstinate unbelief.’ There are not wanting expressions similarly interposed in the purest Class. writers; and such forcible terms, brought in, to use the technical terms of the Greek Grammarians and Scholiasts, παρὰ προσδοκίαν, have a powerful effect. Instances in abundance might be adduced from Thucyd., and the Greek Orators, espec. Demosthenes, but most from Aristoph. The way in which the word is brought in here is quite Pauline, and, like not a few other passages in the speeches and Epistles of Paul, would not have been unworthy of Demosthenes. How exactly the parallel holds in the concluding words, ὅτι ἔργον ὑμῖν, is obvious, for the ‘work’ spoken of is the same in both cases; and the difference is only in the instruments made use of to execute God’s judicial inflections; for ἔργον ἐργάζ. is wrongly rendered ‘I do a thing,’ since it is the work of Divine Judgment. The correspondence in ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις ὑμῶν is remarkable, and it becomes, by the addition of the passage of the Prophet by Paul, a prediction under the Spirit; —for in either case the judgment fell during the lifetime of not a few of the persons addressed.

42. Here we have presented the result of the foregoing address to the audience. Of this the main features are sufficiently clear, but the details are obscured by a strange variety of readings, partly to be ascribed to the words forming the commencement of an ecclesiastical portion, and partly to the introduction of words from the marginal Scholia, to eke out the sense, especially τὰ ἔθνη, which arose from an attempt to fix that which was left uncertain; for the Nomin. to παρο-κάλουν is τινὲς, to be fetched from ἐξιόντων.
 The words ἐκ τῆς Ἰουδαίας are absent from A,
 B, C, D, E, and many cursives (to which I add 2
 Lamb. and nearly all the Mus. copies, also Trin.
 Coll. B, x. 16), and are cancelled by all the Editors, from Scholz downwards. They have also introduced αὐτῶν, meaning the congregation, from A, B, C, D, E, and a good many cursives, to which I can add 2 Lamb. and nearly all the Mus. copies, with Trin. Coll. B, x. 16. The words ἐκ τῆς συναγωγῆς are also cancelled by them on nearly the same authority, confirmed by most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies, and Trin.
 Coll. B, x. 16. I have nothing to object to the text presented by the above Editors, and have virtually followed it,—except that I pause at the introduction of αὐτῶν (which, accordingly, I have expressed in smaller characters), because internal evidence is strongly against it; and this use of the Genit. Participle standing alone, when the subject can be easily supplied from the preceding context, is found in the best Greek writers. See Matth., Gr. § 563, who adduces examples from Hdot., Thucyd., Xen., Plato, and the Dramatic Poets; to which I could add many from Joseph. Ant. xiv. 15. 8. xv. 3. 5, and 7, passages, the Scholiasts, or the Critics, have (as here) furnished the Genit. required. If this be a true view of the origin of αὐτῶν, it will show that the insertions could not, as Alf. says, 'have been made to remove the ambiguity in αὐτῶν.' Whether the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Translators had αὐτῶν in their copies is uncertain; and the authority of Versions in such a case is very slender. That eis τὸ μεταξὺ σάββατον must mean 'the next Sabbath-day,' is required by the context, and is confirmed by the usage of Joseph. Bell. v. 4, 2. Ap. i. 21, and Plut. Inst. Lac. 9.

For ἐπιμένειν MSS. A, B, C, D, E, and many cursives (1 add 3 Lamb. and 2 Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16) have προσμένειν, which has been received by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., and is countenanced by 1 Tim. v. 5, προσμένει ταῖς διήσεσι. But the common reading is more agreeable to the usage of the New Test. Nevertheless, it may be an alteration to introduce a more usual term. By ἡ χάρις τοῦ Θεοῦ is meant, as at ix. 23, 'the work of Divine grace on the hearts of the recipients of the Spirit of grace.' See Calv.

⁴⁴ ἔχομένῳ] So, for text. rec. ἐρχομ., all the Editors from Griesb. downwards read, with A, C², E¹, and about 10 cursives; to which I can make no addition. Nevertheless, internal evidence is so much in favour of ἐχ. that I have adopted it. It is less likely that the Hellenistic and ordinary Greek ἐρχ. should, as Wets. and Matth. thought, have been altered into the Class. Greek ἐχ. than the reverse; especially since Luke elsewhere uses the Class. ἐχ., e. g. Luke xiii. 33. Acts xx. 15. xxi. 26. Indeed, it occurs several times in the Sept.; though there ἐρχ. has crept into some copies. It occurs also in Joseph. Antt. xi. 8, 6, and elsewhere. As for the passage of Joseph. Antt. vi. 11, 9, adduced by Kuin. (τῇ δ' ἐρχομίνῃ), there the best MSS. have ἐχομίνῃ, which Hudson, as appears from his note, meant to edit; though he inadvertently left ἐρχ., which was carelessly reprinted by Ha-

vercamp, Oberthur, and Richter. As for the τε for δι, edited by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from MSS. B, E, G, and many cursives (to which 1 add 1 Lamb. and 4 Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16), it may be the true reading; but, since internal evidence is equally balanced, there is no case for change; especially since the words are often confounded by the scribes. Certainly the δε resumptive has greater propriety than the τε connective.

⁴⁵ ἀντιλέγοντες καὶ βλασφ.] Tisch. has rightly restored the words ἀντιλ. καὶ βλασφ., which had been cancelled by him in his 1st edit, as also by Lachm. Internal evidence is as much in favour of the words as external authority; for thus we have a very forcible mode of expression, denoting the adding insult to contradiction, of which the full import will appear from my note on Heb. xii. 3.

⁴⁷ τίθεικά σε εἰς ὧν, &c.] The words exactly correspond to the LXX. of Isa. xlix. 6, at least in the Alexandrian and other MSS., though the common text (formed on the Vatican MS.) has δίδωκα, for τίθεικα; the former of which is the more literal version of the Hebrew, while the latter is a free rendering. Τίθεικα should be rendered, 'I have appointed,' or 'ordained.' It is strange that Kuin. should consider this passage as properly applicable to Isaiah only, and his calling to the prophetic office, and merely accommodated by St. Paul to his own case. The words are scarcely applicable to the Prophet at all; indeed, there are many parts of the chapter, from whence this passage is taken, that cannot possibly apply to the Prophet, and have no propriety but as referred to the MES-SIAH, 'whose character and office (to use the words of Bp. Lowth) were exhibited in general terms at the beginning of chap. xlii., but here is introduced in person, declaring the full extent of his commission; which is not only to restore the Israelites, and reconcile them to their Lord and Father, from whom they had so often revolted, but to be a light to lighten the Gentiles, to call

them to the knowledge and obedience of the true God, and to bring them to be one Church together with the Israelites, and to partake with them of the same common salvation, procured for all by the great Redeemer and Reconciler of man to God.' Accordingly, this passage of the Prophet might well be said to be Paul's and Barnabas' warrant for preaching to the Gentiles, for by implication it contains an injunction so to do, since the Messiah could only be a light and salvation to the Gentiles by the means of those who should spread his Gospel. Paul, however, had himself received a positive injunction, since (as we find from Acts xxii. 17—21), on his first visit to Jerusalem after his conversion, Jesus appeared to him in a trance, and said, 'Depart; for I will send thee hence far off to the Gentiles.'

48. ἐπίστευσαν ὅσ. ἢ. τεταγμένοι εἰς ζωὴν αἰών. There are few passages of which the interpretation has been more keenly debated than the present, and that from its being supposed to involve a most important doctrine. Most Calvinistic Interpreters take τεταγμένοι εἰς to mean fore-ordained, or predestinated unto, by God's decree; the persons in question being represented as believing under that decree. In refutation of which, some Anti-Calvinistic Commentators rather apply themselves to show that the doctrines of Calvinism are untenable, than that they cannot be found here. But the only question before us is, what may be supposed to be the true sense of the words τεταγμένοι εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον in their present position? Now, in tracing this, it will, I think, appear, that there is nothing which necessarily conveys the idea of an absolute decree, or of predestination. The expression is not προτεταγμένοι (much less, as invariable usage elsewhere would require, προορισμένοι), but simply τεταγμένοι. There is neither προ, nor any thing equivalent. We have, besides, no mention of God, no such addition as ὑπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ. These, and many other such objections are sufficiently obvious, and have been strongly urged by Grot., Hamm., Wolf, Whitby, and Adam Clarke; though, were that all that could be urged against the interpretation in question, it might, perhaps, be deemed insufficient to disallow it. Thus τεταγμένοι might (though there is no proof that it ever did, either in the Scriptural or Classical writers) mean destined; and if destined could be supposed to be the sense, the argument founded on the omission of ὑπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ would not be of any great weight, since that might be thought understood, as in Eph. i. 11, προορισθῆναι κατὰ πρόθεσιν, &c. Thus the sense which the above Commentators assign might, after all, be tolerated, if the context would permit it. But that is by no means the case. There is assuredly nothing, either in the context, or in the language used by St. Luke, either in this Book or in his Gospel, that can lead us to suppose any such sense intended here; nay, there is not a little that utterly excludes it, as will appear from Hamm., cited in Recena. Synop. Suffice it to say (confining ourselves to the context), that such a construction is forbidden by the word ἐπίστευσαν, which, under the present circumstances, can mean no more than that they 'believed in the Lord Jesus, and received the religion which he came to promulgate.' Yet it cannot be supposed that all who did so were predestinated to eternal salvation. 'There were, doubtless (as Schoëtgen observes), among those believers many hypocrites and evil-livers, who eagerly enough embraced the theoretical truth, but cared not for the practice. These, then, could not be predestinated.' And we do not find that those who believed at other times were predestinated; some falling away, as is represented in the parable of the Sower. Nor is it likely that such as believed should come in all at once, but gradually. 'Επίστευσαν, then, can have no reference to their persevering, or not persevering. Besides, as the best Commentators are agreed, there is here an opposition, arising from a tacit comparison between the conduct of these Gentiles, on the one hand, and of the Jews on the other. The Gentiles (τεταγμένοι εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον, and who accordingly received the Gospel) are contrasted with the Jews mentioned at v. 46, who, by rejecting it, acted as if they thought themselves not worthy of eternal life. In short, ἀπωθείσθαι τὸν λόγον τοῦ Θεοῦ is there opposed to ἐδόξαζον τὸν λόγον τοῦ Κυρίου, and οὐκ ἀξίους κρίνεται αὐτοὺς τῆς αἰωνίου ζωῆς το ἦσαν τεταγμένοι εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον. See Krebs, and Wetstein. And as no absolute decree can, by the words ἡμῖν ἢ ἀναγκαῖον—λόγον τοῦ Θεοῦ be supposed in the latter case, so none must be supposed in the former. The former act was voluntary, and so must the latter be.

Having, then, seen what cannot be the meaning of the words, let us examine what is probably their real sense. And in order to that, let us advert to their construction. Now to connect εἰς ζωὴν with ἐπίστευσαν (as is done by some Interpreters of eminence) is too violent a method, and requires an unauthorized sense to be assigned to ζωὴν αἰώνιον. The natural construction must be preserved, and such a sense assigned to τεταγ. as may be suitable to εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον, and be permitted by the usage of the Scriptural as well as the Classical writers. Now many Commentators trace in τεταγ. a military metaphor, and take the sense to be, 'those who had arrayed themselves for salvation,' namely, by hearing the word of God, and not resisting the work of the Holy Spirit on their hearts; thus taking the passive here in a reciprocal sense: than which nothing is more common. The sense hence arising will then be such as that expressed at 1 Cor. xvi. 15, εἰς διακονίαν τοῖς ἁγίοις ἵστασιν αὐτοὺς, and Xenoph. Mem. ii. 1, οὐδὲ εἰς τὴν δουλίαν ἑμαυτὸν τάττω. Yet in this interpretation, and the military metaphor it supposes, there is something not a little far-fetched. And the reason for its adoption seems to have originated in the endeavour to exclude the Calvinistic view, which might seem favoured by the Passive sense. Yet that does not necessarily suppose any over-ruling impulse from without. The expression τάσσεσθαι εἰς may here have the sense it sometimes bears, 'to be thoroughly disposed to,' or 'purposed for,' 'bent on;' like the similar one εὐθετος εἶναι εἰς, 'to be fully disposed for.' Of this signif. several examples are adduced by Krebs and Loesner,—as Plato, de Legg. vi. p. 563, φύσις εἰς ἀρετὴν τεταγμένη. 2 Macc. vi. 21, οἱ δὲ πρὸς τῇ σπλαγχνισμῇ τεταγμένοι, and Ps. lviii. 1, 'Are your minds set upon righteousness?' While, however, we contend that the doctrine of Divine decrees can by no means be found here, yet it is proper to bear in mind that the dispositions of the persons themselves could not have been what they were, still less have been originally such, from themselves; but must be ascribed to the preventing grace of God, to which alone it is owing that men are ever thoroughly disposed to embrace or obey the Gospel of Christ, or (as it is said, John vi. 37, 39) are 'given to him of the Father;' the grace of God, by Christ, preventing them, that they may have a good will, and working with them, when they have that good will, according to the doctrine contained in the Tenth Article of our Church.

—ἐξέβαλον αὐ. ἀπὸ τῶν ὁρίων αὐ.] These may seem strong terms. But we need not suppose that force was employed in removing the Apostles; which, as no resistance was made, would have been unnecessary. The expression may merely mean, that the persons in question, the principal Jews, procured an order for their departure from the magistrates, as necessary both to keep the public peace, and for the personal safety of the Apostles themselves. This kind of order used, indeed, to be given in set form (so Eurip. Med. 274, Εἴπον [jubeo] τῆς γῆς ἔξω πειρᾶν, πρὶν ἂν σε γαίας ταρμόνων ἔξω βάλλω), and there were sometimes officers appointed to superintend the execution of it.

graces of the Holy Spirit for sanctification, and not for working miracles, since hands had not been laid upon them for that purpose.

XIV. 1. κατὰ τὸ αὐτὸ] Supposing this to be equiv. to ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ, we may compare the expression in 1 Cor. xiv. 23, ἐὰν συνέλθῃ—ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ, and v. 26, where we have συνερχέσθαι without ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ. Of this use several examples have been adduced by Kypke from Plut., Pausan., Strabo, Longin., Jos., and Diodor.; but some of them are not to the purpose (certainly not those from Pausan. and Jos., and probably that adduced from Diodor.), as will appear from my note on Thucyd. viii. 5. In the present passage, κατὰ τὸ αὐτὸ may denote, like the Latin simul (by which word, indeed, it is well rendered in the Vulg.) together, i. e. 'in company with,' or 'at the same time;' and ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ has the latter sense in Pa. iv. 9, ἐν εἰρήῃ ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ κοιμηθήσονται καὶ ὕπνῳ. But here the former sense is preferable, espec. considering that the word carries with it, by implication, the latter; and it is much confirmed by Pa. iv. 14, 'We took sweet counsel together (τῆν), and walked unto the house of God in company.' By 'Ἑλλήνων' are meant τῶν σεβομένων Ἑλλ., as they are called at xvii. 4; equiv. to τῶν σεβομένων προσελύττων at xiii. 43.

² ἀπειθοῦντες] 'refusing belief,' 'unbelieving,' equiv. to μὴ πιστεύοντες: a sense occurring also at xvii. 5. xix. 9. John iii. 36. Heb. xi. 31, but rare in the Class. writers, though used as early as the time of Homer, Od. v. 43. Lachm. and Tisch. edit from 3 uncial and many cursive MSS. (to which I add 1 Lamb. and 3 Mus. copies) ἀπειθήσαντες: while Griesb. and Scholz retain ἀπειθοῦντες, which seems confirmed by another passage further on, xvii. 5. Yet I am inclined to receive ἀπειθήσ., which was read by the Pesch. Syr. Translator, and derives some support from Heb. iii. 18. xi. 31. 1 Pet. iii. 20, besides being agreeable to the context; q. d. 'who believed not' at Paul's preaching.

—ἐπήγειραν—ἀδελφῶν] Kypke and Krebs maintain that the construction is ἐπὶ τῆς ψυχᾶς τῶν ἐθνῶν κατὰ τῶν ἀδ., καὶ ἐκάκωσαν. And it is true that τὰς ψυχὰς—τῶν ἀδ. are intended principally for ἐπήγειραν, as appears from xiii. 50. Yet those words are meant to be referred also to ἐκάκωσαν, two clauses being thus blended into one,—the sense being, 'instigated and exasperated the minds of the Gentiles against the brethren,' denoting endeavour; lit. 'endeavoured to make evil affected'; a use of kak. found also in Joseph. Antt. vi. 1, 2, and 7, 3, and 8, 6, ἰσχυροῦτο ὑποβρίσαι, the nearest approach to which is, 'to be made ill by disease'; of which see exx. in my Lex.

3. The μὲν οὖν is resumptive of the preceding matter at v. 1; the words of v. 2 being a semi-parenthetic portion introduced by καὶ, denoting opposition to the present course of unbelief.

— διέτρ. παρῤ. ἐπὶ τῷ Κ.] The full sense is, 'using free-spoken boldness, in reliance on the Lord as their helper to make known the full Gospel, whole truth as it is in Jesus.' The καὶ before δίδοντι has been with reason expunged by all the Critical Editors, on very strong external authority (to which I can add most of the Lamb., and nearly all the Mus. copies), confirmed by internal evidence.—διδόντι is a Dat. of means, — 'by guiding.'

4. ἰσχίσθη 'was split into factions;' on which figurative use of the word see my Lex. It is generally followed by γνώμαι, but sometimes, as here, is in absolute construction, not only in later Greek writers, but also in Xenoph.

5. ἰγ. ὁρμῇ] It is plain from the subsequent term συνιδόντες that the sense is 'a set design,' 'full purpose.' And συνιδόντες at v. 6 means 'being fully aware, by self-perception.' The words τὰς πόλεις τῆς Λυκ. are added by way of explanation to Λύστρ. καὶ Δέρβ., though the Article seems out of place, perhaps from the transposition in the construction.

7. κακεῖ meaning, as Canon Tate (Continuous History of St. Paul, p. 19) points out, at Lysstra especially; as, indeed, I had fully shown, infra xvi. 1; from which passage it appears that Timothy, as well as Lois and Eunice, his grandmother and his mother (2 Tim. 1. 5), must have been then converted to Christianity. There can (continues he), from the nature of the case, be no necessity to suppose Timothy to have been more than fourteen years old when now converted; an age which will happily agree with the passages of St. Paul's two Epistles addressed to him, which allude to his youth. That extent of attainments at the age of fourteen which Josephus records of himself, affords probability sufficient to warrant any such progress in sacred learning as may here be attributed to Timothy at that early age, especially considering that we are told (2 Tim. iii. 15) that the holy Scriptures of the Old Test. were known to him 'from a child.'

8. ἐκάθητο not 'dwelt,' as Kuin. and others interpret it by a Hebraism formed on שָׁן, for even in the passage they adduce in proof Luke i. 79, cited from Isa. ix. 1, that can hardly be said to mean 'dwelt,' the term being a graphic one (suited to poetry) as meant to denote a posture espec. appropriate to calamity and misery. So Ps. cvii. 10, 'such as sit in darkness, bound in affliction and iron,' and Isa. xlii. 7, 'Bring them that sit in darkness out of prison.' Nay, ἐκάθητο may even here be in like manner graphic, with allusion to the miserable condition of him who had never walked, or even stood upright. Indeed, as the sacred writer here accumulates phrase upon phrase, to describe the miserable condition of the poor cripple,—it was the more likely that he should intend thus graphically to represent it by the above expression.

Ἀδύνατος τοῖς π. signifies, not disabled (since he never had the power), but helpless in his feet, who had no use of his feet. Neither does χωλὸς mean 'lame' (as Newc. and Wakef. render), but, as the context requires, and as our Common Version expresses it, 'a cripple,—meaning (according to the real derivation of that word), one who can only creep, and not walk; q. d. 'a creepie,' as the word was formerly spelt.

For περιεπατήκει Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit, from 3 uncial and a few cursive MSS. (to which I add several Lamb. and Mus. copies), περιεπάτησε, which, however, I cannot receive, since Luke never, I think, uses the Aor. I in a Pluperf. sense; for, as to ἐπιστρέψαν at Acts ix. 35, I have shown that it does not exist there. In the Class. writers, indeed, it is sometimes found; but rarely, except in narration; and even there it requires a Conjunction, such as ἐπειδὴ, to be prefixed to the verb suggestively, e. g. Thucyd. i. 102, 5, ἐπειδὴ ἀνιχώρησαν—ξύμ. ἐγένοντο.

9. ἤκουε 'was hearkening,' 'listening attentively to Paul preaching.' On πίστιν ἔχει τοῦ σωθ. see Matt. ix. 21, and Luke vii. 50, and notes.

τῇ is omitted in B, C, D¹, and is cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch. 1, but restored by Tisch. 2; rightly; since internal evidence confirms the strongest external authority; the Article being omitted by the Scribes through negligence, or removed by the Critics as unnecessary, through ignorance of the use of the Article in such a collocation, where it has an intensive force, though hardly to be expressed in a Version. Examples of this use occur in Heb. vii. 24, ἀπαρ. ἔχει τὴν ἱερουσύνην. x. 23; also often in the purest Class. writers, as Thucyd., Hdtot., Xen. Cyr. i. 4, 4, ἐχρήτο—τῇ φωνῇ πονυχαιτέρα. The rationale of this idiom has been laid down by Bp. Middl., and more precisely by Mr. Green, Gr. N. T. Dial. p. 185. I long thought that the above 3 MSS. were the only ones that omit the τῇ, but I am now enabled to add Trin. Coll. B, x. 16, copied from a very ancient original of the Alexandrian recension. Hence I doubt not that the τῇ was expunged by Critics.

11. Λυκαονιστὶ] On the precise nature and character of this dialect, whose existence is attested also by Steph. Byz., not a little difference of opinion exists. The most probable opinion is that it was of Greek origin (forming, as Jablonski and Gahling think, a branch of the old Pelasgic), but by intermixture with the barbaric languages of Asia Minor, peculiarity of pronunciation, and other causes, had become almost a distinct language from the Greek. The Apostles evidently did not understand what was spoken, otherwise they would have prevented the preparation for sacrifice.

12. ἐκάλουν—Ἑρμῆν] From verse 13 it appears that Jupiter had a temple among them; nay, it is probable, from what is there said, that the city itself was sacred to him. And the ancients supposed the gods especially to frequent those cities which were sacred to them. It was not improbable, therefore, that he should appear; of course, in a human form; as also that he should be accompanied by Mercury, since Jupiter was supposed to be generally attended on such visits by that god. That these ἐπιφανεῖαι of the gods are frequent subjects of heathen mythology and poetry has been shown at large by Elen. and Wets., and illustrated by examples from Homer, Od. ῥ. 484, downwards.

—ὁ ἡγούμενος τοῦ λόγου] 'the leading speaker,' or he who had led the discourse. Thus Mercury is called by Jamblichus, de Myst. Æg. 1, θεὸς ὁ τῶν λόγων ἡγούμενος, and by Orph. Hymn. xlvii. 4, λόγου προφήτης, being, indeed, in Heathen Mythology, the god of eloquence. So Hor. Od. i. 10, 1, 'Mercuri fucunde.'

13. ὁ δὲ ἱερ.] Here and just before, v. 11, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. alter δὲ into τε, on the authority of two or three uncial MSS. and a few cursives; but unnecessarily, and perhaps wrongly; for this use of τε, though frequent in the Class. writers, is of rare occurrence in the Scriptural ones. At τοῦ Διὸς there is no ellipse, as Kuin. thinks, but only the god is, by a common metonymy, put for his temple; as in Pausan. iv. p. 337, Μαντικὸς δὲ καὶ τὸ ἱερὸν Μισσηνίου τοῦ Ἡρακλείου ἐποίησε, καὶ ἵσταν ἱεῖς τεύχεος ὁ θεὸς ἰδρυμένους, which evidently means that 'the temple, in which stood a statue of Hercules, was without the wall.' The temple being situated in front of the city shows that Jupiter (thus πρόπολος) was accounted the πολιούχος, or tutelary god of the place. So Æschyl. Sept. c. Theb. 150, ἐν τε μάχαις μάκαιρ' ἀνάσσα πρό πόλει. In ταύροις καὶ στέμματα there may be a Hendiadys for ταύρους ἱετιμμένους, as in Virg. Georg. ii. 192, 'Pateris libamus et auro;' for that the oxen for sacrifice were crowned with a garland, is beyond all doubt. So Lycophr., Cass. 327, says the sacred bulls were σταφανφόροι. However, since garlands were meant for other sacrificial uses, as well as oxen (so Wets. remarks, 'Ipse flores, ipse ara, ipsi ministri et sacerdotes eorum cornantur'), the Hendiadys may, as in many other passages where it is thought to exist, be best dispensed with.—Τοὺς πυλῶνας. I am now of opinion (with Conyb. and Howa.) that these denote the vestibule, or gates, which gave admission from the public street into the Court of the Atrium. To sacrifice the oxen at the city gates, or the portal of the temple of Jupiter, would have been no offering to Paul or Barnabas.

14. For εἰσελθ. I have here followed all the Critical Editors in adopting ἔξελθ., from A, B, C, D, E, and many cursives (to which I add Lamb. 1182, 1184), with the Syr. and Sahid. Versions, confirmed by internal evidence, since it is the more suitable term here, and is further confirmed by a kindred passage of Judith xiv. 17, ἔξεπηδήσεν εἰς τὸν λαόν, κρᾶζων, &c., also by 2 Macc. iv. 18, ἔξεπήδων ἑπὶ, &c., and Jos. Antt. vi. 9, δ. Σαῦλος καὶ πᾶς ὁ στρατὸς ἐκινῶσιν εἰς αὐτούς. Though εἰσεπῆδ. is a far more usual term, and hence it crept in by error of scribes, and not, as Alf. thinks, by 'alteration of Critics, to suit εἰς τ. ὄχλ.,' for that would suppose them blockheads indeed.

15. ὁμοιοπαθεῖς ἔσμεν ὑμῖν ἄνθρ.] The word ὁμοιοπαθεῖς (which is confined to the later writers; see my Lex.) is, indeed, too complex a term to be adequately represented by any one special expression. In fact, the ἄνθρωποι is, as in James v. 17, emphatic; q. d. 'we are not gods, but human beings, of like nature, passions, and affections to yours.' Comp. Plut. t. vi. 188, 11, διάθεις καὶ φύσει ὅμ. 4 Macc. xii. 13, οὐκ ἥλίσθη, ἄνθρωπος ὢν, τοὺς ὁμοιοπαθεῖς, καὶ ἐκ τῶν αὐτῶν στοιχείων, γλωττοτομήσαι. From the passages adduced by Wetst. it plainly denotes generally 'the being subject to all those accidents which attach to human nature,'—namely, to the passions and affections, the wants and weaknesses, the liability to disease and death, which 'flesh is heir to,'—forming the oppositio to the notion of Deity.

—εὐαγγελιζόμενοι ὑμᾶς ἀπὸ, &c.] Here, it is well remarked by Calvin, we have an 'argumentum à repugnantibus;' q. d. 'Does this miracle make an impression on you? Then yield faith to our words. The chief end of our mission is, that all the false divinities, by which the world was heretofore deluded, should be done away with.'

—τούτων τῶν ματαίων] Many Expositors take ματ. in the masculine, and understand it to mean diciones of the god, spoken δικτικῶς, which, they think, is required by the antithetical words, ὁ Θεὸς ὁ ζῶν. It is better, however, with others, to refer the words to the oxen and garlands; or rather, in a general way, to the rites and ceremonies of idolatry (as in 1 Kings xvi. 2, τοῦ παροργίσαι με ἐν τοῖς ματαίοις αὐτῶν, and Joseph. Antt. x. 4, 1, cited by Wetst.); for as idols are often in Scripture called vanity, or vain things, 'a lie;' so may the mummeries of idolatry be so called, as being unreal, and in strong contrast with the service rendered to the living and true God; see note on Matt. xvi. 16.

16. πάντα τὰ ἔθνη] not 'all nations' (which would be contrary to fact), but 'all the nations,' ἔθνη, the Gentiles. Εἶπας πορεύεσθαι ταῖς ὁδοῖς α., 'permitted,' or 'gave them up, to follow the course of their own imaginations respecting the nature and worship of God; and to whom he had not given a revelation of his will, either by Divine legates, or by a written Word.

17. οὐκ ἀμάρτυρον ἑαυτὸν ἀφ.] 'Ἀμάρτυρος signifies 'unwitnessed,' as to existence, nature, attributes, &c. There is here an elegant meiosis; as in Thucyd. ii. 41, οὐ δὲ τοι ἀμάρτυρόν γε τὴν δύναμιν παρασχόμενοι.

That God was sufficiently known to the heathens, though without Revelation, in respect of some of his attributes, by his works of creation and providence, is plain from the testimonies of their most celebrated writers; from whom see examples in my Recens. Synop. The scope of the words is, as Calvin remarks, to take away all excuse for ignorance, by showing them that God had never left himself and his Divine attributes and perfections without a witness; comp. Rom. i. 19, 20.

—ἀγαθοποιῶν] Agreeably to the very nature of God, as the giver of every good gift. Comp. Synes. 192, A, καὶ δι' οὖν ἀπαξ γίγνεται τὰ κακά, τῆς θείας σοφίας καὶ ἀρετῆς καὶ δυνάμειος ἔργον ἰστίν, οὐ μόνον τὸ ἀγαθοποιεῖν (φύσει γάρ, ὡς εἰπεῖν, αὕτη Θεοῦ, ὡς τοῦ πυρὸς τὸ θερμαίνειν, καὶ τοῦ φωτὸς τὸ φωτίζειν) ἀλλὰ καὶ κείνο μάλιστα τὸ διὰ κακῶς ἐπινοηθέντων πρὸς τινῶν ἀγαθῶν τε καὶ χρηστῶν τίλος ἀποτελεῖν. For ἡμῖν καὶ ἡμῶν I have now received ὑμῖν καὶ ὑμῶν, with MSS. C, D, E, and not a few cursives; to which I can add all the Lamb. copies except one, nearly all the Maa. copies, and Trin. Coll. B. x. 16. However, I regard ἡμ., not with Alford, as 'a Critical correction' founded on a mistake, as if the words were of general application, but simply as an error of the scribes; for the words are so perpetually confounded, that the authority even of the most ancient and correct MSS. is in this case of far less weight than internal evidence. There is in οὐρανόθεν ὑετοὺς διδοὺς something almost poetic; and, indeed, οὐρανόθεν is a poetic term. So Aratus, cited by Grotius, ὕδατος ἐρχόμενιο Διὸς πάρα.

—ὑετοῖς] The plural is thought to be used with reference to the two periodical rains, called in James v. 7 πρώϊμον καὶ δεύτερον, and by Philo, p. 390, καιροὶ ὑετίων. But, as that sense would require the Article, I prefer to render 'rains,' 'heavy rains,' as in Ezek. xxxiv. 26, δώσω τὸν ὑετὸν εὐλ., where, for τὸν ὑετὸν, read ὑετοὺς, 'showers,' as in Job xxxvii. 6. And so Lucian, T. i. 104, ὑετοὶ βαγδαῖοι. So also Job v. 10, τὸν διδόντα ὑετὸν ἐπὶ τὴν γῆν καὶ ἀποστρέλλοντα ὕδωρ, &c., where ὑετὸν denotes 'rain in showers; ὕδωρ, 'heavy and drenching rain.' Comp. Matt. v. 45, and see my note there. With διδοὺς καὶ καρποφ. καιροὶ, comp. Orph. Hymn. xx., 'to the clouds of the air: δέριοι νεφέλαι, καρπώτροφοι, where he entertains them, πέμπειν (equiv. to διδοῖν) καρποτρόφους δμβροὺς ἐπὶ μητέρα γαῖαν. And so Max. Tyr., in his Diss. xxv., alludes to all these various modes of beneficence in the Deity, by calling him τὸν ὥρων ταμίαν, τὸν καρπῶν τροφία, τὸν γενεθλίον, τὸν ὑέτιον, τὸν ἐπικάρπιον. In ἐμπιπλῶν τροφῆς—ἡμῶν, we have a construction somewhat rough, but which has a parallel in Xen. Cynag. v. 3 (where the particulars, οἱ δμβροὶ καὶ οἱ ὑετοί, are distinguished), in which we may suppose a brevity of expression, which fully expressed would stand thus,—'filling our stomachs with food, and our hearts with gladness.' Comp. Ps. ciii. 5, and see Calv. There is greater suitability in this topic so finely treated, since it must have come home to the hearts of those, like the Lycaonians, who, as we learn from Strabo, xii. 6, inhabited a country ill watered, and bare of grass.

—νομίσαντες αὐτὸν τεθνάναι] There is surely no foundation whatever for the notion of Reichard and Wetstein, that Paul pretended to be dead. He was, no doubt, in a swoon and senseless; and when we consider that he had been stoned at least almost to death, we shall see that his being enabled to walk home (ἀναστὰς εἰσῆλθεν εἰς τὴν πόλιν), and the next day to set out for Derbe, the circumstance of the sudden recovery can be regarded in no other light than as something preternatural. See Calv., and also Conyb. and Hows., who truly remark, that 'the natural inference here is, that the recovery was miraculous, and must, accordingly, have produced a strong effect on the minds of the Christians who witnessed it.' But why not on the minds of some heathens also, so as to bring them to embrace the Gospel? The circumstance here narrated, of the stoning of Paul, presents a most remarkable instance of the sudden change of feeling in the Lystrian multitude (changeable as the Lycaonians, on the testimony of Aristotle, ap. Schol. ad Il. iv. 88—90, were). However, when we consider the persevering malevolence and enmity of the Jews, always tracking the footsteps of the Missionaries of the Gospel, and endeavouring to undo all that they had effected, we cannot fail to see their hand in the way of instigation on the present occasion. That they had gone to Lystra from Iconium, and even Antioch in Pisidia, we know from v. 14, and probably from other quarters. I agree with Conyb. and Hows. that they probably ascribed the miracle worked on the cripple from his birth, not to Divine, but to Diabolical agency. Hence the feelings of the multitude changed with a revulsion as violent as among the barbarous people at Melita, infra xxviii. 4—6, who first thought Paul to be a murderer, and then a god. Accordingly here the crafty Jews, in their knowledge and civilization taking advantage of a rude and ignorant populace, contrived to accomplish at Lystra the design they had essayed in vain at Iconium.

viā, licet difficili et asperā, transitum esse in regnum Dei.' See more in his admirable note, and also in Chrys., but especially Ammonius, ap. Caten. Oxon. p. 239, seqq., who concludes in masterly style as follows:—'Αδύνατον γὰρ μὴ λυπεῖσθαι ἀνθρώπων, ἡ διὰ τὰ μάταια τοῦ κόσμου, ἡ διὰ τὸν Θεόν· ἀλλὰ τὴν μὲν τοῦ βίου λύπην, διαδύχεται δάκρυον ἀκατάπαυστον· τὴν δὲ κατὰ Θεὸν, εὐφροσύνη καὶ χαρὰ ὄπουσι, καὶ ἐν τῷ νῦν βίῳ (1 Tim. iv. 8), ἀρραβὰνα τῆς τοιαύτης διαρείας λαμβάνοντες, ἀνεκδιήγητον χαρὰν ἔχουσιν οἱ οὐτως λυπούμενοι· καὶ νῦν τὰ σπέρματα ἐν κλαυθμῷ καταβάλλονται (Heb. xiii. 1. Pa. cxxvi. 5), τοὺς καρποὺς ἐν ἀγαλλιάσει μετὰ τὴν ἔσθιν (2 Cor. v. 8, 9) ἐκδημῶν ἀπολαμβάνουσιν.

—παρέθεντο αὐ. τῷ Κ.] 'committed them to the Divine protection'; as it is said infra xx. 32, παρατίθαι ὑμᾶς τῷ Θεῷ, καὶ τῷ λόγῳ τῆς χάριτος αὐτοῦ. Comp. 1 Pet. iv. 19. Prayer and fasting accompanied the action, for greater solemnity.

²⁷ μετ' αὐτῶν] A Hebraism, formed on the use of עִם וְעִם, at Gen. xiv. 12, 14, and rendered in the Sept. ἅλως μετὰ. The best rendering will be 'apud,' 'towards'; a signif. of עִם not unfrequent, on which see Gesner, Lex. in v. § 2. It is found elsewhere only in Luke i. 72. x. 37; and consequently is confined to Luke.

—ἦν.—θύραν πίστεως] The sense, by a figure occurring also at 1 Cor. xvi. 9. 2 Cor. ii. 12. Col. iv. 3. Rev. iii. 8, is, 'afforded free access to the Gospel, its privileges and blessings.' The figurative use of the word does not occur in the Old Test., except, perhaps, at Gen. iv. 7, and there the Sept. fails to represent it; and also at Hos. ii. 15, Symm., 'I will grant the valley of Achor eis θύραν ἑλπίδος,' where the Sept. has διανοῖζαι σύνεισιν αὐτῇ, a blunder of the scribes. Read δ. ἐλπίζειν αὐτοῖς, a free version, in boldly figurative language, to express the joy the returning exiles would have, in again seeing the beautiful far-famed valley in peace. See Is. lxx. 10, and Calv. here. In the Class. writers, I find it only in Plut. vi. 304, φιλοσοφίας περὶ θύρας, and viii. 528, Plato, p. 245, A. See more in note on Col. i.

²⁸ διέτρι. δὲ ἐκεῖ] The Adverb is cancelled by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from 4 uncial and 9 cursive MSS. But, although internal evidence is against it, since it was more likely to be brought in, than put out, yet it was more likely to be omitted by accident in 13 copies, than to have been interpolated from the margin in all the rest. It is moreover confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Version; though I grant that the testimony of a Version in favour of a word of this kind is not of so great a weight as against it. That by the χρόνον οὐκ ὀλίγον must be understood not less than three years, so that Paul and Barnabas might go up to Jerusalem, and return to Antioch at some interval before the journey (recorded in Acts xv.) took place, which produced the Apostolic decree—has been satisfactorily established by Canon Tate, Contin. Hist. p. 140.

XV. In this Chapter is narrated the dispute arising in the infant Church concerning the necessity of circumcision, and the other observances of the Mosaic law to the Gentile converts—the Apostles' Council thereon at Jerusalem, 1—35.

1. τινες] These are supposed to have been Antiochians and Jewish converts, who had formerly been Pharisees (see ver. 5), and still retained an attachment to the forms of the Mosaic law. They are the persons called in Gal. ii. 4 παραισάκτους ψευδαδέλφους.

stands for the whole of the ritual law of Moses, as being the principal observance, and binding the person who underwent it to all the rest. For περιτίμνετε, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit περιτιμῆναι, from 4 uncial, and 7 or 8 cursive MSS. But the authority is quite insufficient, espec. since internal evidence, though it draws two ways, is in favour of περιτίμναι, the other being evidently, as Meyer grants, a Critical emendation. It is strange that Alf. should think περιτίμναι the correction, as being the simpler; for surely, in the style of the New Test., the simpler form of expression is the more likely to be genuine. Here, at any rate, we see the hand at work of a Grammatical Aristarch.

2. For οὖν MSS. B, C, D, and a few cursives (to which I add Lamb. 1182, 1183, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16), read δέ, which is adopted by Tisch.; but Lachm. and Alf. retain οὖν, rightly, the authority for δέ being insufficient, though internal evidence is rather in its favour. I have now, in deference to the united suffrage of the Editors, adopted ζητ. for ζητ. on strong external authority, confirmed by almost all the Lamb. and Mus. MSS., and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16, and, indeed, by internal evidence; for it would seem that ζητ. was adopted to square with v. 7; yet so strange a term as στάσις seems to require συζ. rather than ζητ.; so that, after all, the reading may be an open question. I should have continued to retain the συζ., but in brackets, had I not reason to think that external authority for συζ. is weaker than has been supposed.

3. προπεμφθέντες] honorificè deducti, 'set forward on their way, by a sort of honorary escort'; a mark of respect usually rendered to eminent persons among the ancients; and always shown to Apostles, and of which we have mention further on in this book and in the Epistles. At any rate, this mark of profound respect shows that the mind of the great body of the Church was with Paul and Barnabas, and not with their Judaizing adversaries.—Ἐπιστροφὴν, 'conversion.' Formed on the use of ἐπιστρέφειν, as at xi. 21. xiv. 15.—Ἐποίουν χαρὰν μεγ., 'occasioned great joy.' So Aristid. cited by Wetat., ὁ δὲ Θεὸς ἐποίησέ μοι χαρὰν ὑπερμεγίστην.

4. For Ἱερουσαλὴμ, Lachm. edits, from A,

B, and two cursives, Ἱεροσόλυμα, while Tisch. retains the text. rec. Yet he might as well here, as so often elsewhere, have followed Lachm. This he has done at xxi. 15, where he and Lachm. alter Ἱερουσαλὴμ to Ἱεροσόλυμα, on strong external authority, confirmed by internal evidence, as existing in the fact that, in 23 other passages of his Gospel and the Acts, Luke uses Ἱεροσόλυμα, though not less frequently Ἱερουσαλὴμ; and yet Ἱεροσόλυμα was less likely than Ἱερουσαλὴμ to be altered by the scribes.

5. Ἐξανέστησαν δὲ τινες—λέγοντες] These words are so manifestly the words of St. Luke, that plain readers would be surprised to learn that any other opinion had ever been formed. And yet many eminent Commentators, stumbling at what they think the harshness of the answer being given before the question had been propounded, suppose the words to be those of the Jewish party at Antioch, reported by Paul and Barnabas. But although a transition from the oblique to the direct is occasionally found (as in i. 4. xvii. 7, and Luke v. 14), yet here it would be peculiarly harsh; and the ellipsis of ἔλεγον, which they propose, is inadmissible. In fact, the difficulty is imaginary; for as the words ἀνγγεῖλαι—αὐτὰν plainly import that 'they gave an account of what had happened to them in the exercise of their mission,' so the difficulty which brought them there could not fail to be mentioned. Thus all difficulty vanishes, and ἔξανέστησαν has peculiar propriety, and a touch of the graphic; q. d. 'then there started up.' The word is often used in Thucyd., Xenoph., and the best writers, in the sense to start up suddenly. The Judaizing party, on hearing the matter first propounded, suddenly and hastily started up, saying, by a sort of protest, that it was necessary to circumcise αὐτοὺς, 'them,'—the persons in question. This opinion, it should seem, was given, not at a public assembly, called for the purpose of considering the matter in question, but probably at a private meeting of the principal persons to receive them on their return. The assembly denoted by συνήχθησαν was plainly another, called for the purpose of deciding on the question after due deliberation.

6. συνήχθησαν δὲ οἱ ἀπ.] Thus was assembled what is called the First Council at Jerusalem, to counteract the baneful heresy which had sprung up from the bitter root of Pharisaism, and disturbed the harmony and concord of the infant Church. On the time of this council, see Towns. ii. 177—179; and on its nature, Vitring. de Syn. p. 598, seq. On the circumstances which led to it, and the rise and progress of the heresy it was meant to counteract, consult Dr. Hales, iii. 513, seq.

— Ἰδὲν περὶ τοῦ λόγου] ‘to consider concerning the matter spoken of,’ which involved two questions; 1. Whether the Gentiles should be circumcised? 2. Whether, if so, they should observe the customs of the Mosaic law? The former was answered decidedly in the negative; the latter partly in the affirmative. The συζητήσις, just after, must be understood of ‘disputation’ between the Apostles and presbyters, and those persons who had at the former private meeting given their opinion so positively.

7, seqq. St. Peter argues, that God, by pouring out his Spirit on the uncircumcised Gentiles, as he had done upon the circumcised Jews, had plainly demonstrated that he made no discrimination between them and the Jews in the distribution of the Gospel privileges; and that legal purification, which seemed wanting to them on account of their non-circumcision, he had abundantly supplied in purifying their hearts by faith. After this proof, therefore, that God did not require from them the Mosaic observances, it was nothing less than tempting God, and setting aside his counsels, to impose the yoke upon them.

7. ἀφ' ἡμερῶν ἀρχ.] Some Expositors take this to mean, à principio, ‘from the beginning of the Gospel.’ Yet the purpose in question was not made known till the conversion of Cornelius; for to that the words διὰ τοῦ στόματος μου plainly allude. And the expression will appear to be not inapplicable to the period in question (about fifteen years before), if we consider that ἀρχαῖος is often used simply of what has happened heretofore, whether many ages, or only a few years before; of which abundant examples have been adduced.

— Ἰν ἐξελέξατο—ἰθνη we have a brief mode of expression for ἐξελέξατο ἐν ἡμῖν ἐμὶ (‘has chosen me’), ὅτι διὰ στόματος μου τὰ ἰθνη, &c. Dr. Lightfoot is of opinion that these words of St. Peter have reference to the words of Christ to the Apostle, promising to him only of all the twelve the keys of the kingdom of heaven; not giving thereby to Peter any paramount or autocratical authority over the rest of the Apostles (much less meaning that it should be communicated by succession to other ecclesiastical autocrats), but merely intending that he should be the man who should first unlock the door of faith and of the Gospel unto the Gentiles; which was accomplished, as we read in Acts x. and xi.

8. καρδιογνώστης] See note on i. 24. By this the Apostle intimates, that God can best determine who are worthy of being admitted as Christians, and who not; as also on the rites and ceremonies to be enjoined on them.

— ἐμαρτύρησεν αὐτοῖς] The sense seems to be, ‘hath borne testimony in their favour,’ ‘hath testified his approbation,’—namely, by giving them the Holy Spirit, as unto us.

9. Here the argument is further carried on; q. d. ‘And (though they had not been circumcised, or bound to conform to the law of Moses) made no distinction between us and them,—namely, by having purified their hearts (souls and consciences) by faith;’ q. d. (with Calvin.) ‘And God, who knoweth the hearts of all (and how unclean they are by nature), inwardly purified the Gentiles;’ but it is added that that purity is in faith,—meaning, that the same All-sufficient Sacrifice can cleanse both Jews and Gentiles if applied by Faith, whereby both become alike spiritually clean.

10. Here we have the second part of the speech; in which the Apostle shows how pernicious is the doctrine that the enemies of Paul would introduce; a doctrine such as would take away all hope from the pious. From the preceding clause, indeed, he infers and collects that God is tempted, if the Gentiles be compelled to observe the Law; but besides this he goes to the very reason of the thing. So far he has argued, that the Gentiles are wronged, by requiring of them more than God requires; and since he has bestowed on them the privilege of adoption, it were absurd to suppose they should still be rejected, and the goodness of God limited; in short, it is sufficient that they have faith, though ceremonies they have none. Now, however, he proceeds to show, that those who tie down men's salvation to the works of the Law, leave them nothing to hope; nay, indeed, the whole world is delivered up to destruction the most fearful, if it can attain salvation no otherwise than by observing the Law. (Calvin.)

— τί πειράζετε τὸν Θεόν] Meaning, ‘Why try ye the forbearance of God, in perversely resisting his will, by throwing obstacles in the way of its accomplishment?’ So 1 Cor. x. 9, καθὼς καὶ τινες αὐτῶν ἐπειράσαν. Heb. iii. 9, and often in the Old Test., as Exod. xvii. 2, 7. The argument is, that ‘it is plainly the will of God that these persons should be received as Christians without such rites;’ that he has, in fact, already accepted them. Hence to attempt to impose rites which he hath been pleased to abolish, would be 'resisting his will;' which were as criminal, as vain; see Rom. ix. 19.

11. ἀλλὰ διὰ—ἀκεῖνοι] The full sense, partly intimated, and partly expressed, is: 'Yea, by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ alone do we trust we shall be saved,—in which same way alone they too are to be saved.' Comp. Gal. ii. 15, 16, and Rom. iii. 30. The inference is obvious, and therefore left to be supplied,—that a thing so unimportant to salvation, as the observation of the ceremonies of the Mosaic Law, ought not to be exacted from the Gentile converts.

12. ἐσίγησε δὲ πᾶν τὸ πλῆθος—ἐξηγ.] meaning, that 'thereupon the assembly at large (so πλῆθος at Luke xxiii. 1) kept a reverential silence, and listened to Paul and Barnabas while recounting,' &c., for the purpose of establishing the facts on which the validity of their reasoning rested. The argument being, that 'as God had approved their work, by causing miracles to be worked by them in its accomplishment, so what they had done in this matter had his entire approbation.'

13. ἀπεκρίθη Ἰάκωβος] Render: 'James addressed them;' meaning James the brother of our Lord, and the writer of the Epistle. The Apostle (so styled at Gal. i. 19), after confirming what was just said by Peter, as to the calling of the Gentiles,—well aware that, in addressing Jews, it was always of great importance to ascertain whether any thing, which purported to be the will of God, was in accordance with the predictions of Holy Writ,—further shows, that however contrary to the prejudices of many among them, yet that it was agreeable to the predictions of the Prophets,—instancing a remarkable one of Amos ix. 11, 12, from which the quotation is made from the Sept., with some freedom of rendering, and minute variation, the better to adapt the passage to the purpose. The former part is agreeable to the Hebrew text; but the latter part,—both in the Sept. and the New Test., differs widely; and there can be no doubt that the Sept. had in their copies some reading differing from our present copies,—whether the reading proposed by Lightf., or another, I would not say; but I refer my readers to Hoffm. in loc., who has skillfully reconciled the discrepancies. He has ably and conclusively shown that the Apostle has not (what some would have us suppose) merely accommodated the passage to the present subject. That St. James regarded the scope here adopted to be the intent of the prophecy, is plain from the very purpose for which he adduced it; it being his principal intent to show that, according to the Prophets, espec. in this remarkable passage, it was contemplated that the Gentiles should be introduced to the privileges of the children of God. In order to evince that this is the true application of the passage of the Prophet, he first offers the following preliminary data:—'Agitabatur in Synodo Hieros. grandis illa questio:—Num Gentiles, Christo nomen daturi, recipi queant in Ecclesiam absque circumcissione? Quibusdam eandem negantibus, Petro vero, Paulo, ac Barnaba, necnon Jacobo, illam affirmantibus, ita quidem, ut tres priores factis pugnarent, Jacobus autem dicto Vet. Test. eoque uno ex multis; emphaticè enim primo dicit v. 15 omnes Prophetarum sermones in eo conspirare, quod Deus tempore Nov. Test. etiam e gentibus sibi sumpturus sit populum; deinde vero dictum Amos producit, ut illustre hujus rei testimonium; dispendicium igitur, num recte illud applicaverit Jacobus?' He then proceeds to show that the Jews, and their friends, the Heterodox Christian Theologians, have left no stone unturned to detort the passage to any other meaning than that which the most eminent Theologians, ancient and modern, have assigned to it; and, after over-ruling their objections, and exposing their perversions, he subjoins the following, by way of inference:—'Nimis clare Apostolus Jacobus dictum hoc interpretatur de conversione Gentium, quam ut de ulla re alia cogitare nobis liceat. Thesis enim, cui v. 15, Prophetas, e quibus Amosum deinceps loco omnium adducit, harmonicum præbere testimonium asserit v. 14, hæc erat, quod Deus e Gentibus populum sibi sumserit in nomen suum, h. e. cum alias gentes et populus Dei in Scriptura sibi opponantur, Deum tamen hoc paradoxon jam cepisse effectui dare, ut e medio Gentium sibi assereret populum, qui ratione circumcissionis quidem a Judæis maneat distinctus, et tanquam incircumcisiis reliquis gentibus similis sit, sed tamen populus a nomine Dei denominatus, æque ac Judæi.' He concludes with the following remarks:—'That Jewish Theology in James's age did expound the words of the Prophet in the same sense as James, we may rightly infer for this reason,—that otherwise the Christian ex-Jews, and now Judaizers, would not on this occasion have submitted to his interpretation of the passage, and, least of all, to the conclusion thence deduced by him,—entirely adverse as it was to their prejudices,—that the Gentiles were to be admitted into the Church without circumcision. Hoffm. adds that the very Talmud, in a passage adverted to by him, refers the citation to the Messiah. That the Apostles themselves apply such passages to the Christian dispensation cannot be doubted. See Acts ii. 17, and note; and still less, that the Apostle here adduces the passage of Amos to prove that Christianity is the fulfilment of Judaism, or, in other words, that the Jewish dispensation was a preparative for the Christian. The Apostle's determination of the agitated question—introduced by the impressively suasory ἀκούσατέ μου, and the decisive, but not dictatorial, formula—ἐγὼ κρίνω, had, as was likely, from the character both of the person and of his opinions (occupying the confines of the two Dispensations), the greatest weight, in carrying with it the general opinion of the Assembly to the conclusion, proposed by the Apostle,—that those who from among the Gentiles had turned, or were turning, unto God, should not be troubled by any Jewish obligations, except such as were necessary for the peace and amity of both parties. The words which follow the passage adduced are very important, as connected with the true view of that passage; though in considering it we are encountered by difficulties not so much of interpretation, as of reading. To advert to each in their order. If the reading in the text. rec. be the genuine one, the purpose of the words seems to be (as Calv. observes) to anticipate the objection (which to many might seem fatal), that this view of the subject was a mere novelty. The Apostle contends that it was not new to God, though it might seem novel and sudden to man; that God, who sees every thing future, and knows what he will accomplish, had foretold, by his prophets, the foundation of a spiritual kingdom, into which both Jews and Gentiles should be received. It therefore formed part of His eternal plan, as predetermined by God; consequently immutable, and by man irresistible, Rom. ix. 19. So far every thing is quite coherent; for the words which follow the quotation are as necessary to the reasoning as those which precede it, and they are highly essential to introduce the decision itself, Διὸ ἐγὼ κρίνω. Nevertheless, the passage is so roughly handled by some Critical Editors, as to be useless for the above, or, indeed, for any purpose. To give an account of their so called emendations, and the grounds thereof,—the words ἰστί—αὐτοῦ are cancelled by Matth., Griesb., Scholz, Tisch., and Alf., on the authority of B, C, and 12 cursives (to which I can only add Lamb. 1182), confirmed by the Copt. and Sahid. Versions; and though the authority is but slender, it is rather confirmed by internal evidence, which is against the words. Yet their antiquity is evident from their being found recognized in the Pesch. Syr. Version; and one might say in the MSS. A and D; for I doubt not that the reading γνωστὸν—ἔργον arose from a mere error of scribes. Alf. thinks, after Meyer, that 'the addition ἰστί—αὐτοῦ was made to fill up the apparently elliptical γνωστὰ ἀπ' αἰῶνος, which, not being found in the passage of Amos, was regarded as a sentence by itself.' But that is taking far too much for granted. Besides that the γνωστὰ ἀπ' αἰῶνος have a very awkward effect, if referred to the preceding; so much so, that if the words ἰστί—αὐτοῦ be removed, so must the γνωστὰ ἀπ' αἰῶνος, for which there is next to no authority. Were I to choose a solution of the difficulty connected with the reading, I should prefer that of Matthiz, who supposes that the words γνωστὰ—αὐτοῦ are an addition to the Ecclesiastical Reading, 13—17, appointed to be read at the Festival of the Dedication of a Church; and that, to somewhat lengthen the great brevity, and to eke out what seemed wanting, the words were added in the Lectionaries, and from thence came into the MSS. at large. It may possibly have been so; and the conjecture is more probable than Mr. Alford's. But what proof is there that it was so? None at all. Besides, that supposition is excluded by the fact, that the complete verse is found in the Pesch. Syr. Version, formed from copies which were written long before the time when Lectionaries began to be made. With such satisfactory authority, external and internal, for the genuineness of the words, it were idle to object, that it is impossible to account for the words being removed. We are not bound always to account for the omission of words. But when we consider the almost incredible carelessness of scribes in that respect, and the rashness of slashing Critics, nothing of this sort need much surprise us, since there is hardly any thing that is incredible.

19. ἐγὼ κρίνω meaning, 'My judgment,' or 'decided opinion [on the matter] is.' So Thucyd. iv. 60, ὡς ἐγὼ κρίνω.

— μὴ παρενοχλεῖν—ἀλλὰ ἱπισταίλαι, &c.] The full sense is, 'to give them no unnecessary molestation [by imposing on them what is not necessary], but only to direct [what is necessary] that,' &c.

— ἐπιστρέφουσι] seems to mean, 'are turning,' or 'who turn,' as in Pesch. Syr. But to advert to the particulars of the prohibition, τῶν εἰδωλολατρῶν, &c.; the term εἰδωλολατρία is Hellenistic, and derived from εἰδωλόν, to pollute. Both it and the noun are used alike of physical and moral defilement, especially that of idolatry, as the greatest; see Dan. i. 8. Eccus. xl. 29. Mal. i. 7, 12, where the subject is meat offered to idols. Here, however, in order to determine the sense, the words τῶν εἰδώλων are added. Now, though the word might denote any participation in idolatry, yet the passages of Daniel and Malachi (which were probably in the mind of the Apostle), as well as the ancient glosses of Heaych. and Suid. (formed from the early Scholiasts, and theirs from the expositions of the Fathers), determine it to be the eating of meat offered to idols: not merely the partaking of it in the temples, but even the purchasing of it for use, when it was taken for sale into the public market. For we learn from the passages cited by the Commentators, that among the Gentiles, after a victim had been sacrificed in the temple, and a portion had been given to the Priests, and sometimes another eaten by the offeror and his friends on the spot, the residue was often taken home by the priests for domestic use, and sometimes was sent to the public shambles to be sold. The flesh, however, was, of course, held in abomination, regarded as an ἀλογία, by the Jews (see 1 Cor. x. 20); and therefore the use of it was very properly forbidden, in order that no needless offence might be given to the Jewish Christians.

— καὶ τῆς πορνείας] It has been thought strange that this should be inserted among things of themselves lawful, but from which the Gentiles were to abstain, lest they should offend the Jewish Christians; fornication having never been accounted as a thing permitted; and no reason would appear why, if greater offences are mentioned with smaller ones, this alone should be selected, which, it has been thought, would go far to put the things mentioned in this list on a level. To remove this difficulty many methods have been devised; some proceeding on critical conjecture (thus Bentley proposed to read χοιρίας, pork); while others seek to remove the difficulty by supposing some unusual sense of the word; some understanding it of spiritual whoredom, viz. idolatry; others, marriage with idolaters; others, again, of marriage within the prohibited degrees. All which are alike open to insuperable objections, and espec. to this, that no recondite or uncommon sense could be intended; since in public edicts words are supposed to be employed in their usual and ordinary sense. And here there is no sufficient reason to abandon the common rendering, fornication; which has been well defended by Grotius, Wetst., Valckn., Schoettg., Rosenm., Kuin., Wahl., and espec. Bp. Marsh; who satisfactorily removes the objections to the word being taken in its ordinary sense, showing that there are other instances to be found of moral and positive precepts, duties of common and perpetual obligation, mingled with local and temporary ones, in the same list; as in the Decalogue. And since (continues he) it appears from the Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistles of Paul, that the precepts of the Pentateuch were abrogated only by degrees, it seems by no means extraordinary that the Decree of the Council in Jerusalem should contain a mixture of moral and of positive commands. I would add, that it is not unimportant, in this view, to remark, that in the words of the decision actually sent (ver. 29), we find the two kept separate, πορνείας being put apart from the rest, and placed last. As to the objection founded on fornication being never thought indifferent, it might not in theory, or philosophical speculation, but was so considered in practice. No one who is at all acquainted with the Classical writers can doubt, that simple fornication was, by the Heathens, considered as no crime at all. We find that even their religion permitted, nay, encouraged, licensed fornication. Hence the recommendation of chastity of this kind (for that contained in abstaining from adultery could not need enforcing) was highly necessary; the main purpose (as Grotius observes) of this list being to specify from what practices, besides known and flagrant sins, the Gentile Christians ought to abstain, in order to coalesce with the Jewish Christians without offence. Of course, the moral abomination of the practice is not here in question.

— τοῦ πνικτοῦ] scil. κρέας (supplied in Athen. l. ix.), meaning flesh of animals killed by strangling, which was very prevalent among the ancients, both Greeks and Romans, and also Orientals. They used to enclose the carcase of the animal (so killed that the blood should remain in it) in an oven, or a deep, and closely covered stewing vessel, and thus seethe it in its own vapour, or steam. As to the blood,—the heathens, when butchering an animal, carefully preserved this, and, mixing it up with flour and unguents, formed various sorts of dishes. Now as both the foregoing sorts of food were strictly forbidden by the Mosaic Law, espec. the latter (the Jews being enjoined to consider the blood as the seat and principle of life, and therefore not to eat of it, but offer it in sacrifice to God), there was ample reason to forbid them to the Gentile Christians, in order to avoid the giving offence to their Jewish brethren.

21. Here (as at v. 18) there is no little abruptness of transition, and seeming want of connexion between this subject and the preceding. But the connexion may be traced by supposing that here, as often, in sentences commencing with γὰρ, there are some words to which that Particle may be referred, left to be supplied from the context and subject-matter; which may, on the present occasion, be done as follows: '[And remember, the violation of these will occasion not only private, but public scandal;] for the Mosaic religion has, from remote antiquity, had its professors in every city, and its Scriptures publicly read in the synagogues every sabbath day,—in which these things are strictly forbidden.' The 'every city' shows how extensive were the colonizations, x. and w. of the Jewish people, who, in their written Law and ceremonial observances, were opposed to all other nations, but bound to each other by a common faith, and whose life was abhorrent from all idolatry, and dissolute licentiousness of Pagan society as well as idolatrous worship.

22. ἔδοξε τοῖς ἀποστόλοις—πέμψαι.] The Syntax in ἐκλεξαμένους is generally thought anomalous, since strict propriety would require ἔδοξε τοῖς ἀπ. ἐκλεξασθαι ἄνδρας καὶ πέμψαι, or, at least, ἐκλεξαμένοις. 'Εκλεξαμένους, however, is put, by an Hellenistic idiom, for ἐκλεξαμένοις. The idiom is often found in Joseph. and the Hellenistic writers; also in the ordinary Greek of Polyb., Diod. Sic., and others.—Ἄνδρας ἡγουμένους denotes 'leading men'; an idiom, by which the Participle is used as an Adjective; as in Thucyd. i. 5, ἡγουμένων ἀνδρῶν οὐ τῶν ἀδυνωτάτων.

23. The καὶ before ἀδελφοὶ are omitted in MSS. A, B, C, D, and one cursive (to which I can make no addition), and the Vulg. Version, and are cancelled by Lachm. and Alf.; but they are retained by Tisch., rightly; since the authority for omission is far too slender; and internal evidence is not in favour of the removal. Mr. Alf. thinks the words were inserted to bring the decree into exact harmony with v. 22, or else, which he thinks more probable, that, as De Wette pronounces, it was removed upon Hierarchical considerations. For my own part, I regard one as quite as probable as the other, and both highly improbable; and I cannot but protest against this imputing corrupt practices, whereby the Fountains of the word of God are defiled,—to any party whatever,—without strong grounds; which here do not exist. It is in the highest degree improbable that such a presumptuous alteration should have been introduced into all the copies but 5,—two of which can stand only for one; No. 13 being (as Jackson of Leicester long ago saw) a fellow copy from the same original as the D. It is far more probable that the οὐ was first absorbed, as often, in the αὶ preceding, and that the καὶ was afterwards omitted by the usual carelessness of scribes. Perhaps this omission first occurred, and then the οὐ would be absorbed in the final οὐ of ἀδελφοὶ. Vain is it to allege the authority of VOL. I.

Irenæus for the omission, since his citations are generally too loose to have much weight. Whereas the authority of the Pesch. Syr. Version for the words so confirms the evidence of all the MSS. except 4 or 5, as to leave no doubt of their authenticity.

24. ἐτάραξαν ὑμᾶς λ.] The same expression occurs at Gal. i. 7. v. 10, and Plato, p. 373, ταραττει αὐτοὺς ἐν τοῖς λόγοις. Lucian, Scyth. § 3, has the plainer one ταρασσῖν τὴν γνώμην. And so Cic. Tusc. iii. 2, 'perturbari animos.' The next words ἀνασκ. τὰς ψυχὰς ὑ. are exegetical of ταρασσῖν here; and the sense of both seems to be, 'removing and perverting your minds [from the truth], equiv. to unsettling; the contrary to θεμελιῶσαι, used in 1 Pet. v. 10.

—λέγοντες περιτ.—τὸν νόμον.] These words are omitted in A, B, D, and one cursive (No. 13, a fellow copy with D), and in the Vulg., Copt., and Sahid. Versions, and are cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch. Alf. pronounces that the words are manifestly an interpolation, from the desire to specify in what particular, &c. But how can he use the term 'manifestly,' where there is such scanty evidence against the words, which are confirmed by all the MSS. except 3 or 4, and by the Pesch. Syr. Version? And as to internal evidence, that is in their favour; for I quite agree with Con. and Hows., that Meyer and De Wette have proved that they cannot be an interpolation. I find them in all the Lamb. and Mus. copies; and Jacks. testifies that they are in Irenæus, l. iii.

26. ἀνθρώποις παραδεδωκόσι τὰς ψυχὰς α.] Not, 'delivered up,' but, 'given up,' 'exposed [to hazard],' 'jeopardied their lives.' A very rare use, but of which I find exx. in Plato, p. 312. Οὐδὲ ὅτι παραδίδωσι τὴν ψυχὴν οἰσθαι. Dan. iii. 28, παρίδωκαν τὰ σώματα αὐτῶν. 2 Macc. vii. 37.

Such, indeed, were, in the earlier ages, always sent in the form of verbal messages, by trusty persons to deliver by word of mouth; and that custom continued down to the age of Thucyd. And even on the introduction of written messages, or despatches, during the Peloponnesian war, still the custom was retained of permitting the messenger to explain any obscurity in the Epistle, or to give further particulars of matters only briefly adverted to in the letter (so Thucyd. ubi supra, and Jos. Ant. xvii. 5, 7, ἐπεμν ὡς Κρίσθρα ἐκπέμπει γράμματα περὶ αὐτοῦ, καὶ τοὺς ἀπὸ γλώσσης διδάξοντας, &c.), nay, occasionally to act as a sort of ambassador plenipotentiary, in order to treat on the business at issue. Sometimes, however, the messengers were forbidden to say any thing (see Arrian, Exp. Alex. ii. 14, 6); and therefore the words καὶ αὐτοὺς διὰ λόγου, &c., here may be considered as informing the persons addressed, that the messengers were empowered to deliver the same message by word of mouth, and more fully and explicitly, if desired. Accordingly, we may render, ‘who will also themselves tell you, by word of mouth, the same things [that we now write to you].’ Διὰ λόγου stands for ἀπὸ γλώσσης in the above passage of Josephus; and in Thucyd. vii. 10, οἱ παρὰ Ν. (πυμφθίντες) ὅσα ἀπὸ γλώσσης εἰρητο αὐτοὺς εἰπον, meaning these things, in addition to what were written in the letter; but here only to deliver the same words to the same purport, as in the letter.

²⁸ ἔδοξε γὰρ τῷ ἁγ. Πν. καὶ ἡμῖν] On further consideration it now seems to me, that the Hendiadys is, as on very many other occasions, better dispensed with, and the persons,—the Holy Spirit, and the Apostles,—kept distinct; for though the sense, ‘to us, as being under the influence of the Spirit,’ would be true, yet not so weighty a truth as the words here used call for—as Calv. well saw, who ably remarks, ‘Quod se adiungunt Apostoli et Presbyteri Spiritui Sancto comites, in eo nihil sibi eorum attribuit, sed perinde valet hæc loquutio acsi dicerent, sibi ducem ac presidem fuisse Spiritum, æque eo dictante statuise quod scribunt.’ He refers to a similar case in Exod. xiv. 31. Indeed, Mr. Alf. must take substantially this view, since he well remarks, that ‘here the decision of the Holy Spirit is laid down as the primary and decisive determination on the matter—and [then] their own formal Ecclesiastical decision [couched in the ἔδοξε] follows.’

³¹ ἐχάρησαν ἐπὶ τῇ παρακ.] I know not why so many eminent Commentators should have interpreted παρακλήσει exhortation; for what was there of exhortation in the Epistle? Surely the common interpretation (confirmed by all the ancient Versions), consolation, or comfort, is more suitable and natural; as will appear from the able note of Calv., who remarks, ‘non parvam in eo consolationis materiam fuisse, quod, agnito Apostolorum consensu tum singuli pacati fuerunt, tum omnes ex dissidio redierunt in gratiam.’

³² προφῆται ὄντες] ‘because they were also themselves prophets;’ inasmuch as they had brought the prophetic gift (on which see supra xi. 27) into use, by employing it in a discourse of some length, in which they both exhorted and strengthened the converts by suitable instruction; stating, we may suppose, the grounds and reasons on which the determination of the Synod was founded, showing why the whole ritual was not enjoined, and why a part was retained; and withal defining the cause, nature, and extent of the duty of abstaining, in certain cases, from things naturally lawful.

bably, but not certainly, an interpolation, and consequently I have only bracketed the words.

36—XVIII. 22. Paul's second missionary journey alone through Asia Minor to Macedonia and Greece, and thence by sea to Jerusalem, and his return from Jerusalem to Antioch.

36. ἐν αἷς] The plural is used because the antecedent involves the idea of plurality; as 2 Pet. iii. 1, ταύτην δευτέραν γράφω ἐπιστολήν, ἐν αἷς.

37. ἐβουλεύσατο] 'was minded,' or 'disposed,' as v. 33, and xxvii. 39, where the term represents the result of mental deliberation.

38. ἤξιον τὸν—τοῦτον] There is here somewhat of irregularity in the construction, seemingly occasioned by the strong mode of expressing Paul's decided refusal to take John with them,—and especially in the repetition of the Accus. after συμπαραλαβεῖν, which, however seemingly pleonastic, is intensive: also in the τοῦτον for αὐτόν there is an implied censure. A Class. writer, or Paul, would have written τὸν τοῦτον. Of course the former Accus., τὸν ὑποστάντα is one of reference, quod attinet ad; as often in the New Test. in St. Paul's Epistles, but rarely in St. Luke, as here, and supra x. 36, τὸν λόγον, ὃν ἀπ.—οἷδατε τὸ ῥῆμα. Thus we may render, 'Paul, however, deemed proper, as regarded one who had fallen off from them from Pamphylia, and had not gone with them to the work—that man to not take (decline to take) with them.'

39. παροξυσμός] 'sharp contention' or 'disputation.'

—ἀποχωρισθῆναι—ἀπ' ἀλλήλ.] a constractive prægians for 'they parted asunder, and departed two different ways.' Comp. 1 Kings xviii. 6, Ἀχάβ ἱπορεύθη ἐν ὁδῷ ἄλλῃ μόνος, καὶ Ἀβδ. ἱπορεύθη ἐν ὁδῷ ἄλλῃ μόνος, ἀρὰ, 'alone.'

XVI. 1. κατήντ. εἰς Δ.] The term κατ. is used with allusion to the elevated situation of the mountain pass by which Paul passed from Cilicia into the plain of Lycaonia to Derbe, to which he would come first, and then to Lystra. That Paul took his route from Syria, penetrating the mountain chain of Taurus at the pass of the Cilician Gates, and then down into Upper Cilicia at the Province of Tyanitis, is shown by Conyb. and Hows., p. 277 seqq., who have adduced some important and many interesting particulars. I am still of opinion, against many Expositors, that Lystra, and not Derbe, was probably the birth-place of Timothy; and I find this confirmed by the suffrage of Canon Tate, Conyb. and Hows., and Alf. As to ch. xx. 4, adduced to prove him of Derbe, the Δερβαῖος there must refer to Gaius, and Gaius only, otherwise Luke would have written καὶ Γάιος καὶ Τιμόθεος, Δερβαῖοι. He does not add Ἀυστραῖος to Τιμ., because it was unnecessary, he having as good as expressed that here,—for certainly the ἐκεῖ cannot well be understood of any other than Lystra, since that was the last-mentioned place.

2. ἐμαρτυρεῖτο] Meaning, 'he was well reported of,'—namely, for his early piety (he was even now only about 18) and great knowledge of the Gospel. Paul, indeed, had himself converted him in his previous missionary journey. See supra xiv. 7. I think it probable (with Mr. Alford) that some of these testimonies were intimations of the Spirit respecting Timothy's fitness for the work of Evangelization, since Paul (1 Tim. i. 18) speaks of τὰς προαγούσας ἐπὶ σε προφτείας.

3. περιτέμεν α.] He had not been circumcised, probably because (as we learn from the Rabbins) his mother had no right to do that without the father's consent, which he would not give. The reason why Paul circumcised him (which he might do without any violation of Christian liberty, as being of Jewish birth, and because, though circumcision was not enjoined as necessary to the Gentile converts, it might yet be sometimes expedient) is just after suggested.

δ. αἱ μὲν οὖν ἐκκλ.] This verse is not the commencement of a new section, but the introduction to it, which is supplied by the force of the μὲν οὖν, which may be rendered, 'accordingly.' See supra ix. 31, and xii. 24. Thus the verse serves to connect the preceding and the following context by a common link with ἐπερ. τ. π. and ἐπερίσσε. τ. α. See the excellent remarks of Calv. in loc.; and comp. supra xv. 3.

6. διελθ.—Φρυγίαν] meaning, as Conyb. and Hows. show, p. 257, Phrygia Major, forming the great central portion of Asia Minor, but whose boundaries from the contiguous provinces cannot be exactly defined. Accordingly, the route of the Apostles must be too uncertain to be laid down except by guess. Ἀσία, meaning the Asia Proconsularis, or Propria, including only Mysia and Caria.

7. κατὰ τὴν Μ.] Render: not 'in,' or 'into' (for they did not enter Mysia), but (with Valckn.) 'unto, as far as;' meaning, to the borders of. It should seem that when they finally determined not to go to Asia, they had so far advanced in their journey thither, as to be opposite to the chain of Mount Olympus. Then they went forward in a due westerly direction, until they came to the borders of Mysia, intending to make their way into Bithynia, by the plain of the river Rhyndacus, or at the western end of the chain of Olympus.

—ἐπείρα.—Βιθ. πορ. καὶ οὐκ εἰσεν α. τὸ Πνεῦμα] After Πνεῦμα, MSS. A, B, C², D, E, and some six or seven cursives of the same family, with the Syr. and Vulg. and other Versions, add Ἰησοῦ, or τοῦ Ἰησοῦ, which is received by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., but on grounds which I cannot yet regard as satisfactory. The external authority, however strong in uncials, is weak in cursives; for I find the reading only in 2 Lamb. and 1 Mus. copy, though the evidence of the ancient Versions strengthens the authenticity of the word. As to internal evidence, it is almost equally balanced. It cannot fail to strike every attentive inquirer, that as τὸ Πνεῦμα Ἰησοῦ is a very rare expression, occurring no where else but in Phil. i. 19 (and there in a different sense), we might far better account for the omission by the scribes, than for the insertion of Ἰησοῦ by the Critics. And yet we do not elsewhere find that rare expressions are cancelled by the scribes. Besides, when any very unusual forms of expression occur in

MSS. that are connected with important doctrinal questions, we are to advert to the possibility,—nay, probability,—that there may have been tampering with the text by the ancient Theologians, either by adding something to the text, or by removing something from it. Now it appears from the note of Wetstein, that the Romanists, a little after the printing of the Greek Text, maintained that Ἰησοῦ had been expunged by the Nestorians; which is incredible. They might rather have been expected to add than to remove it. The addition, however, I suspect, came from the Arians, who would have more reason to add it, in order to do away with so striking an example of τὸ Πνεῦμα in the personal sense. Thus it is caught up by all the Socinian interpreters. And when once introduced by the Arians, it would be likely to be admitted by the Nestorians, who would rather have it than not. By the former of these it was, I suspect, foisted into the Vulgate, and by the latter into some copies of the Syriac Version, and from thence it would easily be transmitted to the Ethiopic, Coptic, and Armenian Versions. Moreover, the word is strongly discountenanced by the context. For, to use the words of Bp. Middleton, 'in the preceding verse we are told that the Apostles were forbidden of the Holy Ghost to preach the word in Asia; in the present, that, on their attempting to go into Bithynia, the Spirit suffered them not.' It is, therefore, highly unnatural that the τὸ Πνεῦμα of the latter verse should be meant of any other than the τὸ ἅγιον Πνεῦμα of the former. How this hindrance was intimated, whether by dream or otherwise, has been variously conjectured. Certainly had it been through direct revelation by dream, that would have been expressed. All that we are warranted in saying is, that some Divine intimation (as to the nature of which I would not presume to speak positively) distinctly informed the Apostles that it was not the Divine will that the Gospel should as yet be preached in these parts of Asia. We may, however, suppose that a strong mental impression (which the Apostles knew how to distinguish from ordinary mental feeling) was produced by the influence of the Holy Spirit.

—κατὰ τὴν Βιθυνίαν] Several MSS., including a few Lamb. and Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B. x. 16, and some Versions and Fathers have αἱ, which has been received by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; but without sufficient reason; since the external evidence for the reading is weak (Versions and Fathers being, in a case like this, of little weight), and internal evidence not favourable; for the αἱ is evidently from the margin, being an alteration of those who wished to remove a tautology, and make the sense plainer, not aware that the κατὰ here means versus, in the direction of, as Montanus, Beza, and Piscator render. Had it been the true reading, it is difficult to imagine how it should have been altered into κατὰ in the great bulk of the MSS.

8. παρελθόντες—Μυσίαν] Mr. Alf. affirms that παρελθ. must, from the context, mean 'having passed by Mysia, as regarded their work of preaching,' i. e. omitted to evangelize it. But that is rather cutting than untying the knot. The same may be said of the interpretation, 'passed through,' 'traversed,' besides, being open to the objection, that such a sense would require διελθ., read, indeed, in MS. D, but purely from conjecture. It is plain that a figurative sense of the word is not to be thought of in such a narrative context as this. On the whole, I do not see why we should not take παρελθόντες to mean 'having taken their route along the side of Mysia, namely, as travelling along either its Northern, or its Southern borders, or frontiers. Which of these two routes is to be adopted will depend upon the exact point where the Apostles were, when their change of course was adopted, in consequence of the Spirit's forbidding them to proceed. Now that has been, I think, laid down by Con. and Hows. as satisfactorily as so uncertain a point can be,—namely, near the ancient Azani, a place where the boundaries of Asia, Bithynia, and Mysia meet together. Now here, in taking their course, as they seem now to have intended to do, to the sea-coast of the Ægean, in some such way as παρελθεῖν τὴν Μυσίαν, they might skirt along the Northern border, along the level country towards the Euxine; or else, which is far more probable, as being the shorter course, they might pass along the Southern border. This view is adopted by Con. and Hows., who are of opinion that, 'by revelations which were anticipative of the fuller and clearer communication at Troas, the destined path of the Apostolic company was pointed out through the intermediate country to the West. Leaving (they add) the greater part of what was popularly called Mysia to the right hand, they came to the shores of the Ægean, about the place where the deep gulf of Adramyttium, over against the island of Lesbos, washes the very base of Mount Ida.' But we have no ground whatever, from the narrative of St. Luke, to suppose that the Apostles bent their course to the gulf of Adramyttium, which lay a good deal to the left of their course. The exact route is not laid down by Con. and Hows. I believe it to have been across the Azanitis and Abasitis; thence across the chain of Mount Temnos to Didyma Teiche; and thence along the low-lands at the foot of the chain of Temnos and Pedasus to the base of Mount Gargara, whence they descended into the Troad; and, so passing along the valley of the Simois, they reached Alex. Troas,—the place of embarkation.

9. καὶ ὄραμα—ὤφθη, &c.] Whether this was in a dream, or whether it was a representation made to the senses when awake, Expositors are not agreed; and the will of God was made known in both ways: but the probability is, that it was a vision of the same kind as that which appeared to Peter, as recorded supra x. 3; where see note. The apparition was recognized to be a Macedonian, not so much by the dress, as by the few words in the Macedonian Greek dialect, imploring spiritual help in making known the Gospel.

10. Here we have the first introduction of the Gospel into Europe. Twice had the Apostles essayed to pursue their Missionary labours in Asia (vv. 6, 7), and twice had the Holy Spirit inhibited them to do so; in fact, stopping up every path but one—that which conducted them to Europe, which is now for the first time to be visited by the light of the Gospel.

—ἐξητήσαμεν] 'we sought,' meaning, by their inquiring for a ship. From the use of we after that of they thus far, it is plain that the writer of this book himself became the companion of Paul and Timothy in this journey, having, it would seem, joined them at Troas, and then continued, with a short break between xvii. and xx., to the period recorded at the end of the book.

—συμβιβάζοντες] 'concluding, by inference;' how the word comes to signify this, see note on ix. 22, and my Lex. in v.

—προσέειπ.] 'had called and appointed us unto the work.' See xiii. 2. Perf. Pass. put for Middl. Deponent. See Matth. Gr.

11. ἀναχθέντες—εὐθυδρομήσαμεν] Here we have two nautical terms; the former, as used of 'setting sail' (literally, 'loosing ropes'), the latter, of 'sailing in a straight course' (as we say, 'running before the wind'), to any point without tacking; which implies a fair wind. So that the expression, which recurs at xxi. 1, and occurs often in Philo, is equiv. to the Classical εὐριοδρομεῖν. The minute accuracy of the term is shown by Con. and Hows., and the extraordinary shortness of the passage is well accounted for.

12. πρώτη τῆς μ. τῆς Μακ. πόλις] We are here encountered by a difficulty, which has occasioned a variety of opinions, some of which cannot be true; e. g. that which represents Philippi as the metropolis of Macedonia; for this would be contrary to fact, Thessalonica being undoubtedly the capital. And such will be equally the case if we take πρώτη for 'most considerable.' Indeed, by so interpreting we overlook the force of μερίδος, which, in such a connexion, can only be 'province.' And that Macedonia had long been divided into four districts, we learn from the Historians. Indeed coins of the Provincia prima and secunda have been found. Hence it has been the opinion of many learned men that instead of πρώτη τῆς we should read πρώτης; by which the sense will be, 'which is a city of the Provincia prima of Macedonia.' Yet not a single MS. is found to support this conjecture; which, indeed, is at variance with probability, as introducing a sort of minute circumstance not very likely to have been adverted to by the sacred writer. It is better, therefore, to retain the common reading, and explain it as we best may. Now the main question is, whether πρώτη may be supposed to mean 'the principal,' or 'a principal.' If we adopt the former sense, we encounter the objection, that Philippi was not even the capital of the district, but Amphipolis, as we learn from Livy and Diodorus. Hence Michaelis and Kuin. adopt the latter sense; and they appeal to the evidence of Eckhel, Doctr. Vet. Numm. P. i. vol. iv. p. 282, in attestation of the fact, that πρώτη was sometimes so applied as to mean a principal, though not the principal city of a country; and for this Jackson refers to the Marmora Oxoniensis, p. 66. But we can hardly suppose so minute a propriety adopted in popular narrative. And I am now inclined to embrace the view taken by Wieseler, and, after him, by Con., Hows., and Alf., that the sense is, 'the first Macedonian city of the district,' meaning, that 'it was the first they came to (Neapolis belonging to Thrace) in Macedonia.' Though, after all, this is only exchanging one difficulty for another: the designation τῆς μερίδος would seem worse than useless. It would remove all scruple to adopt Wieseler's interpretation, could we suppose that τῆς μερίδος came from Critics who wished to remove the objection, that Philippi was not the capital of Macedonia, by making it, what it doubtless was, the capital of its district, forming a subdivision of the Province—(of course from not seeing the true force of πρώτη). The authority for the absence of τῆς μερ. is not contemptible,—one uncial (D), and about 10 ancient cursives, the Pesch. Syr. Version, and the Arab. of Erpenius, and Chrys.; and more may be found, though I am not enabled to add any.

13. For πόλις, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit πόλης, from MSS. A, B, C, D, and 7 cursives of the same family (to which I add Lamb. 1182), confirmed by several Versions; but not the Pesch. Syr. Internal evidence is rather in its favour, from its minute particularity, as pointing at genuineness. But such overwhelming external authority, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Version, for πόλις, must forbid any change.

—παρὰ ποταμὸν] 'by the river side;' not 'by a river,' as our English Translators render.

The Article is here omitted on account of a preposition being used. This ποταμός, however, (not the Strymon, which is many miles distant,) is a mere rivulet (formed by the fontaines, from which Philippi derived its first name, Crenides) running into the Strymon. A striking attestation to the truth of the narrative; for the river is so small as only to be found in the best modern maps, and is called, as Col. Leake attests, p. 217, Gangites.

—οὗ ἐνομιζέτο προσευχῇ &c.] Some difference of opinion exists as to the sense of these words; which the earlier Commentators take to mean, 'where prayer was wont to be offered up,' fieri; while the later ones interpret, 'where, according to the [Jewish] custom, there was a proseucha, or oratory.' That such places were frequent where, from the paucity of Jews, no synagogue was found, is proved by a reference to Tertullian and other ancient theologians; as also that such were situated, for the convenience of purification, by a river-side; since among the Jews (as also the Christians, and even the Heathens) ablution always preceded prayer. Yet how the words οὗ ἐνομιζέτο εἶναι can have the above sense, it is difficult to see. Ἐνομιζέτο here plainly refers to local, not to general custom. As to the objections which have been urged, that the common interpretation yields too indefinite a sense, and that it is incorrect in phraseology; the former has not a shadow of reason, and the latter is overturned by one of the passages adduced to establish the other interpretation, namely, Philo contra Flaccum, p. 523, τὰς προσευχὰς ἀφῆρητο, οὗ ἐνομιζέτο προσευχῇ εἶναι, where we have the very expression in question, and in the very sense in which it is here commonly interpreted. And from its being accompanied with the term προσευχῇ, proseucha, it is evident that Philo thought it necessary to add the words following, in order to determine the sense of προσευχάς. Whereas St. Luke chose to use a circumlocution, in preference to a term which might require the addition of this very circumlocution to explain it. It might seem, indeed, that the sense proseucha is required by the words at ver. 16, προνομιζόμενον ἡμῶν εἰς προσευχὴν; but see note there. However, since it would seem that the words there point at a sense including both place and action, and as the sense here must be the same as there, there is no doubt that the true sense is, 'where meeting for prayer was accustomed to be held.' The προνομιζ. at v. 16 requires the place, but it does not reject the action; as is certain from Joseph. Vit. § 57, ἡμῶν τὰ νόμιμα ποιούτων καὶ εἰς προσευχὰς τρεπομένων, and Artem. iii. 538, οὐδαὶ ἀνείκω εἰς προσευχὴν, μὴ οὐχὶ φροντίζων σφόδρα. The prayer-place in question may be supposed to have been not an edificus, but simply a grove, the boughs of the trees, at top, being drawn over, and interlaced, to form a kind of Gothic roof, as in the ancient Druidical places of worship. So Eriphan. Hieros. 80—91, cited by Hensen. der Apost. Paulus, p. 114, says, ἀλλὰ καὶ προσευχῇ τόπος ἐν Σικίμοις, ἐν τῇ ὑπὸ καλομένῃ Νεαπόλει, ἔξω τῆς πόλεως, ἐν τῇ παιδιᾷ, ὡς ἀπὸ

αἰθρῇ τότῃ ἰστί κατασκευασθῆς, ὑπὸ τῶν Σαλαριτῶν. There can be no doubt that the place here spoken of is of the same kind as the above; for although the τόπος προσευχῆς is said to be in the open air, 'sub dio,' yet the terms θεατροειδῆς and κατασκευασθῆς call for some such formal as I have indicated. The term ἐλαλοῦμεν means, not 'we discoursed with,' as Wakef., but 'discoursed to,' as used of teaching and preaching; which is called for by the preceding καθίσαντες, which alludes to the posture adopted, i. e. the usual one of teaching; see Matt. v. 1, and note. It is plain that the congregation consisted of women only, not, as is commonly supposed, a mixture of both sexes.
To account for which, we may suppose, that since that separation of the sexes which always subsisted in regular buildings, such as synagogues, was impossible in places like the present, the same purpose was effected by the sexes attending at different times.

¹⁴ Λυδία] This is manifestly here a proper name, which was common both among Greeks and Romans.—Πορφυρόπωλις means 'a seller' not of 'purple dye,' as some suppose, but of 'purple vests,' for the dyeing of which the Lydians were famous (even from the time of Homer), who seem to have participated in, or rather succeeded to, the reputation of the Ty-rians. She was probably a resident of Thyatira in Lydia, where her vests were manufactured, but then sojourning at Philippi, for the purposes of her business. The minute accuracy of Luke's narrative is confirmed by various Inscriptions, found in Boeckh., which relate to the guild of dyers in Thyatira. The communication between Thyatira and Philippi was, as Con. and Hows.
show, very ready. From the expression σεβο-μένη τὸν Θεόν, it is plain that Lydia was a Jewish Proselyte of the Gate.

— ἤκουεν] 'was in the act of listening as a hearer.'

— διήνοιξε τὴν καρδίαν] An expression probably derived from the Hebrew; for we find it in the Jewish prayers, also in 2 Macc. i. 4, διανοιξαι τὴν καρδίαν ὡμῶν ἐν τῷ νόμῳ αὐτοῦ καὶ ἐν τοῖς προστάγμασι. But it is here used in a Christian sense, which is to be carefully attended to.
Now the mind is said to be closed against admo-nition, when either from prejudice, it cannot discern the truth, or from pride and perversity, will not admit it. Hence, to open the mind, denotes 'to render it, by an appeal to the reason, more intelligent,' to cause that any one shall better perceive the truth, and more readily yield assent to it. But the expression here used 'to open the heart,' means not merely 'the enlightening of the understanding,' but far more, 'the renewing of the corrupt will and affections, and purifying of the heart,' which can, of course, only be done by the influence of the Holy Spirit.

Bengel well says, 'Cor clausum per se; sed Deo est [per Spir. Sanct.] id aperire.' However, we must here suppose an enlightening of the understanding as well as an inclination of the heart; for the one is, as well as the other, the gift of God. See Calvin's note.

¹⁵ εἰ κεκρ. με πιστὴν τ. Κ. εἶναι] meaning, 'if you have accounted me a true believer by admitting me to baptism;' this being, as Calvin points out, a modest appeal; q. d. 'By the faith in me which you have approved by the seal of baptism, do not refuse my request to sojourn with me.'

¹⁶ πορευομ. ἡμῶν] 'as we were going;' no doubt on some other day, not the same as before.
Before προσευχῇ, MSS. A, B, C, E, and some nine cursives, prefix τὴν, which is adopted by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; and Alf. thinks the τὴν was omitted through misapprehension of the meaning of προσευχῇ; but since this is the same place as supra v. 13, where Alf. explains, 'where a meeting was accustomed to be,' the Article may not have been thought necessary. Yet a pure Classical writer would have used it,—the very reason why the Alexandrine Critics would be likely to insert it. The slenderness of external authority (for I find it in not one of the Lamb. and Mus. copies) casts a great shade on its genuineness.

— ἔχουσαν πνῦμα Πύθ.] Πύθων was, in Greek mythology, the name of a large serpent slain by Apollo (see Ælian, V. Hist. iii. 1), and transferred, as an appellation, to Apollo himself; from whom, as the god of divination, it came to be applied to soothsayers, conjurors, and those who pretended to evoke spirits. Now, as ventriloquism was a most useful art to persons of that profession, they generally acquired more or less of it; hence the word is sometimes explained ventriiloquist in the Greek Lexicographers. And these πύθωνες were so called, because the god was supposed to speak from their stomachs, and emit words through their throats, without using any of their own organs of speech.

Whether this girl was a ventriiloquist or not, has been much disputed. The affirmative has been maintained by many foreign Expositors;
but the negative has been generally maintained by the most eminent Commentators; and with reason; for there is nothing in the name, still less in the circumstances, to warrant the former supposition. Other Expositors maintain that she was a pretender to the gift of divination; and some, that she was a mere lunatic, who (like Johanna Southcott) thought she was inspired to foretell future events. But both of these notions (especially the latter) involve insuperable difficulties, being inconsistent with the view taken by the Sacred writer; which requires us to suppose (as the ancient, and most modern Commentators have done) that the girl was possessed by an evil spirit, which enabled her occasionally to foretell future events. The expression, then, is a kindred one with that used by St. Luke in his Gospel, iv. 33, ἄνθρωπος ἔχων πνεῦμα δαιμονίου ἀκαθάρτου.

On the whole subject of demoniacs and of demoniacal influence, suffice it to refer the reader to my note on Matt. viii. 31. That the present case was recognized by the Apostles as one of those works of Satan which their Lord came to destroy, is manifest; inasmuch that, as Mr. Alford observes, all attempt to explain away such a narrative is futile. As to the reading, whether Πύθωνος, or Πύθωνα, as Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit from A, B, C, and one cursive of the same family, Alf. grants that it is difficult to decide between the readings; and therefore he has chosen the more ancient reading, from its external authority, Πύθωνα. But he forgets that external authority does not depend on three MSS., however ancient (espec. when found frequently to falsify), but from the evidence being supported by the concurrent testimony of a competent number of ancient and good cursives, here entirely wanting. But there there is only one (for the Lamb., Mus., and Trin. Coll. copies, all have Πύθωνος), and that of no great note,—the Cod. Lincoln. 2. Accordingly, since the reading is found only in four copies, we may suspect that it arose from an error of the scribes. In short, it were uncritical to reject the authority of all the MSS. except four, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Version, and some copies of the Vulg.; also Didymus, ap. Caten. Oxon.

— ἐργασίαν] ‘gain;’ as in Joseph. Bell. ii. 7, 2, and sometimes in the Classical writers. See my Lex.

— τοῖς κυρίοις] It has been proved that the common possession of slaves exercising a very gainful occupation was frequent.

17. ἔκρα[ε]] Whether on one particular occasion, or more, is not clear; but if the latter, we may compare the case of the demons in Matt. viii. 39. Luke iv. 31. Accordingly, we are authorized in supposing the words δούλοι τοῦ Θεοῦ pronounced, however reluctantly, by the evil spirit, through the organs of speech of the girl, and thus bearing the same testimony to the Apostles as had been borne by other demons to our Lord.

After καταγγ. for ὑμῖν, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ἡμῖν, from A. C³, G, H, and many cursives (I add Lamb. 1182, 1183, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16), and Alford regards ὑμῖν as ‘an alteration, as better suiting the speaker.’ But if ὑμῖν be not the genuine reading, it may more probably be attributed (with Olsh.) to an error of the scribes,—the words being perpetually confounded. In such a case weight of external authority, confirmed by the most ancient Versions (the Syr. and Vulg.), ought to decide,—and that is in favour of ὑμῖν.

19. ἐξῆλθεν] There seems to be (as Valckn. remarks) a paronomasia with the preceding ἐξῆλθιν, since with the going out of the demon was gone their hope of gain. Ἐλκεν is, like σύρειν (on which see infra xvii. 6, and supra viii. 3), not necessarily to be understood of personal violence, but only of the constraint of law, by any one’s being impleaded. So the Latin rapere in jus, and rapere ad prætorium. Ἀρχοντας is a general term; in the place of which we have, in the next verse, the more special one στρατηγοί; for so, it seems, the magistrates at Philippi were called. The term was applied to the officers denominated by the Romans Prætores Urbani. The term may, however, as Wicseleer thinks, have been derived from the Greek title of similar magistrates, found in Aristot. Polit. vii. 3.

20. ἐκταράσσουσιν ἡ. τ. π.] ‘are causing great disturbance to the city,’ or ‘community.’ The charge made was twofold: 1. that they were disturbers of the public peace; and, 2. that they were teachers of unlawful religious customs and rites: both charges falling under the cognizance of the magistracy. So Servius on Virg. Æn. viii. 187 (cited by Wetstein), ‘Cantum fuerat apud Romanos, ne quis novas introduceret religiones.’ And though the Romans were not intolerant, yet, in their permission to foreigners to worship God according to their consciences, it was understood that there should be no public attempts at proselytism. And whenever the former charge was connected with the latter, the magistrates were bound to punish, and that with the utmost severity. So Julius Paulus, Sentent. v. 21, 2 (cited by Wetst.), 'Qui novas religiones inducunt, ex quibus animi dominium moveatur, honestiores deportantur, humiliores capite puniuntur.' In 'Ἰουδαῖοι ὑπάρχοντες' it is suggested, that their offence is so much the greater, by the persons being, as foreigners, and of a most despised nation, those who ought the less to have ventured to commit it.

21. ἰθῆ] meaning, 'religious rites and customs.' See supra vi. 14, and note.

22. περιβρῆξαντες] By this use of the word, with which may be compared that of the Latin scindere, is always denoted a hasty, and, if done by another, a violent stripping off (περὶ, lit. 'from around') of the clothes. So Xenoph., cited by Raphael, τὴν ἰσθίαν περιβρῆξαντες, and Diod. Sic. l. xvii. 35, οἱ τὰς ἰσθ. περιβρῆγνυνται. Here we are to understand a stripping to the waist only; as in Plut. Poplic. 6, τὰ ἱμάτια. This scourging was, we may suppose, inflicted, not as (as some have imagined) quæstionis ergo, in order to extort a confession of guilt, but, as a temporary punishment, to satisfy the people; the final examination of the charge being reserved for another occasion, after time had been taken to make further inquiry into the affair.

24. τὴν ἰσχυρὰν φυλ.] So Liv. Hist. xxxiv. 44, 'Pleminius in inferiorem demissus carcerem est.' Jails were not so strongly built at the outer part as the inner; to which there was access by several gates, and where sometimes there were subterraneous dungeons. Chains, too, were added, to secure the prisoners committed there, and a machine employed, called ξύλον, of wood bound with iron, in which the arms and head were sometimes confined (as in our pillory), but more frequently the legs only, or rather the feet; for the machine was one in which the feet were constrained and bruised. Hence it was called ξύλοισι, ποδοκῆν, and ποδοστράφη (Hebr. טב, Job xiii. 27. xxxiii. 11). So Plaut. Pæn. v. 6, 28, 'ne sis apud me in lymeâ custodiâ.'

Sometimes the machine was one in which all the members were held, by being thrust through five holes; whence it was called πεντεσύριγγον. So Aristoph. Eq. 1049, τουνού Δρῆσαι ὁ ἰκέλευε πεντεσύριγγον ξύλω.

25. προσυχ. ὕμνου τὸν Θεόν] Render, 'while praying, they were singing praises to God,' who had strengthened them to bear this heavy trial. The words following, ἐπηκροῶντο δὲ αὐτῶν οἱ δέσμοι should be rendered, 'and the prisoners (in the outer prison) were hearkening, listening attentively, to' the notes of praise wafted to their ears in the deep stillness of the night;—a most graphic touch, of singular beauty, and meant, as Expositors suppose, to intimate to the other prisoners, by their praying aloud, that they had a conscience void of offence. It is scarcely necessary to say, that the term ἐπηκρ. admits of, nay, rather, calls for, the version auscullabant, when it does occur, which is but rarely, once in Plato; also in the Test. xii. Patr. p. 710, with this passage in mind, the writer says ἐπηκροῶτό μου, πῶς ὕμνου τὸν Κύριον.

26. καὶ πάντων τὰ δεσμὰ ἀνέθη] By this expression many Commentators understand that the chains of the prisoners were relaxed, though not so much as to place them quite at liberty. This, however, is difficult to be conceived; and, from the use of the word in the Classical writers, ἀνέθη τὰ δεσμὰ can only signify that the chains were so loosed, that they 'were freed from their constraint': a circumstance like the preceding ones, undoubtedly to be ascribed to Divine interposition; the great intent of the whole transaction being, to evince, in the most decided manner, the presence of the Deity. And as the opening of the prison doors might have been ascribed to accident and a natural cause (namely, the earthquake), therefore, it should seem, the prisoners were likewise all of them, by miraculous interference, set free from their chains, yet held enchained by a supernatural influence, that they should not endeavour to make their escape. To ascribe this, as some Rationalists have done, to the effect of the electric fluid of lightning dissolving the chains, is a notion so utterly against sound reason, as well as sober religion, that nothing but the credulous incredulity of scepticism could for a moment entertain it. In short, the miraculous is stamped upon the whole transaction.

29. αἰτήσας φῶτα] So Plutarch, vol. ii. p. 311 (cited by Weststein), φῶς αἰτήσας. Phædr. x. 10, 24, 'dum quærunt lumen.' Here, indeed, the plural is used; but that seems to have been by a common idiom (as in several other words) of plural for singular. So in Strabo v. p. 187, ed. Sieb., and Xen. Hist. v. 1, 8, we have τὰ φῶτα for lumen.

— ἔντρομος] Various causes might produce this tremor, especially that of awe, as in the presence of Divine legates,—attested to be such by the late supernatural occurrences.

30. προαγ. ἔξω] i. e. out of the inner into the outer part of the prison. As to the interrogation, τί με δεῖ—σωθῶ; it is strange that so many Expositors of no mean repute should render, 'What must I do to be saved?'—namely, from the punishment of the magistrates, or the wrath of heaven for harshly treating persons thus singularly distinguished by the Divine favour. But surely, as respects the former, the jailor had done nothing to merit punishment; and as to the latter, the blame rested not on him, but on the magistrates. The true sense of the words is doubtless that commonly assigned to them,—'by what means can I attain unto eternal salvation?' exactly as in the similar inquiry of the people to John the Baptist, Luke iii. 10, 'What shall we do?' τί ποιήσομεν; and that of others to our Lord, John vi. 28, τί ποιῶμεν, ἵνα ἔργαζώμεθα τὰ ἔργα τοῦ Θεοῦ; meaning, as appears from the preceding verse, 'works such as shall endure as ζῶν αἰώνιον.' Finally, such was the inquiry of the Apostle himself (supra ix. 6), when, 'trembling and astonished,' even as the trembling jailor here, he said, in answer to that reproving voice from above, 'Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?' Certainly the jailor could not be ignorant that his prisoners had professed to teach the means of attaining unto eternal salvation: and seeing their Divine commission so to do thus placed beyond all doubt, by the Divine interposition lately exerted in their behalf, well might he put the anxious question, 'Masters, what shall I do to be saved?'

31. πιστ. ἐπὶ τὸν Κύρ. 'I. X. καὶ σωθ.] 'We have here,' says Calvin, 'a very brief and yet full definition of the mode of salvation,—a simple, and plain, yet effectual declaration. They did not direct the jailor merely to wait on the means of grace by prayer, and thus seek for salvation, but at once to do the thing enjoined.' — 'Habet enim,' adds he, 'unus Christus omnes beatitudinis et æternæ vitæ partes in se inclusas, quas nobis per Evangelium offert; hæc autem recipimus.' He proceeds to remark, that, after we have embraced Christ in faith, that alone suffices for salvation. But the next member of the sentence, καὶ ἐλάλησαν αὐτῷ τὸν λόγον τ. Κ., &c., affords a better expression of the nature of faith. Accordingly, they did not stop short at the πίστευσον—καὶ σωθήσῃ, but proceeded at once to address to the jailor the Word of God—the Gospel. I may add, that this answer purports to come from Paul and Silas; yet that the words were pronounced by Paul we cannot doubt,—so strikingly characteristic are they of Paul and his teaching throughout his Epistles.

32. καὶ πᾶσι] For καὶ, Lachm. and Tisch. edit. σὺν, from 4 uncial and several other MSS. (I add Lamb. 1182), and the Vulg. Vers.; perhaps rightly, for internal evidence is much in its favour; and quite suitable is the sense thus arising, namely, 'together with all those in his family.' The καὶ arose, I suspect, from those who did not see the force of the σὺν, and therefore thought the καὶ required; which is not the case.

33. ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ὥρᾳ τῆς ν.] 'at that very hour of the night,' unreasonable as it was.—'ἔλουσεν ἀπὸ τῶν πλ. It is not necessary to suppose, with some, λουοι put for ἐλ. καθαρίζων. There is a blending of two forms of expression,—namely, ἔλουσεν αὐτοὺς, and ἐπίλουσεν αἷμα τῶν πληγῶν. So Hom. II. Σ. 345, ὅφρα τάχιστα Πάτροκλον λούσειεν ἀπο βρότον αἱματόεντα, where λούσειεν—αἷμα, is for ἀπολούων β. αἷμα.

34. ἀναγαγὼν τε αὐτοὺς εἰς τὸν οἶκον αὐτοῦ] 'and having conducted them up to his house or lodge.' The jailor's house was, it seems, for obvious reasons, higher than the rest of the prison, æspec. the inner one, which was, it seems, subterranean. This sense of ἀναγ. occurs supra ix. 31. Luke ii. 22, also in the Sept. and the Class. writers.—παρέθηκε τράπ., a pure Classical phrase, denoting 'the setting forth food.'—The expression πεπιστευκῶς τῷ Θεῷ, after ἡγαλλιάσατο π., is capable of more than one sense, but not with due regard to the Particip. Pres., which is a Particip. of 'mode,' or 'means;' as in 1 Cor. xiv. 18, εὐχαριστῶ λαλῶν. Acts x. 33, καλῶς ἐποίησας παραγινόμενος. Luke xxiii. 8, ἐγὰρ ἰδὼν, and elsewhere in Joseph. and the Class. writers. Thus I would render, 'He rejoiced at having believed, been brought to have faith.' So the Arab. translator must have understood the words; and so they were taken by Erasmus, Calvin, Beza, and others.

—λάθρα ἡμ. ἐκβάλλ.] 'are they privily turning us out?' a kind of expression partaking of the graphic. On the Roman law on this point, and on the privileges of Roman citizens in foreign countries, numerous passages have been adduced from ancient writers. In what sense the Apostle was enabled to call himself a Roman citizen, is a point much debated. Some think it was on the ground that Tarsus was a Roman colony, or at least a municipium. Now the municipia were properly Italian towns, on which had been conferred the jus civitatis; whereby the citizens of those places had the public and private rights of Quirites, and moreover made their own laws, and elected their own magistrates. There were, however, some municipia, which had not the right of suffrage, and so possessed not the full jus civitatis. Yet Tarsus (Paul's birth-place) was neither a colony nor a municipium, but an urbs libera. See Pliny, v. 27. Now these free cities lived under their own laws, had their own magistrates, were independent of the jurisdiction of the Roman president, and were not occupied by Roman garrisons. With this freedom the Tarsæans had been presented by Augustus, as a compensation for the damages they had sustained in the cause of Julius Cæsar, in the course of the Civil War. That the Tarsæans had not the jus civitatis Romanæ, is also hence apparent, that the Roman Tribune, notwithstanding he knew Paul to be a Tarsæan (see xxi. 39), ordered him to be scourged (xxii. 24), though he desisted as soon as he understood that he was a Roman citizen. See xxii. 29, seq. It should therefore seem, as some suppose, that one of Paul's ancestors had had this freedom given him for some service rendered to Cæsar in the Civil Wars. In the words ἡμᾶς ἀνθρ. Ῥωμ. ὑπάρχ. Commentators, taking for granted that Silas was not a Roman citizen, would take the singular as put for the plural, dignitatis gratia. But this is far from necessary; for though it be true that 'Silas is no where else called a Roman citizen,' yet it is no where said, or even hinted, that he was not so. That he was, his very name Silas, for Silvanus, renders probable. Nor was the jus civitatis, in its most limited sense, then so very difficult to be acquired. It might be asked, why the Apostle did not on this, as on another occasion (infra xxii. 25), urge his privilege in the first instance, when it might have sheltered him from the ill-treatment he had received. The best mode of accounting for the thing is to suppose that he was prevented from so doing by the tumult and clamour of the populace.

—οὐ γάρ] An elliptical formula, like many similar ones in Greek, Latin, and English, in which the brevity of expression (to be supplied by ποιεῖν ἴδει, or the like) is very well suited to a feeling of indignation. Render, 'now ila,' 'no, indeed!' See Kühn. Gr. § 741, 6, who adduces exx. from Aristophanes. Ἀλλὰ ἐλθόντες, &c. seem to point at a sort of symbolical action, expressive of conviction of their innocence. This, indeed, appears from the citations of Commentators, to have been not unfrequently done by way of making the amende honorable. Thus Apuleius, l. iii. p. 134, tells a story of a person, who was falsely condemned by the magistrates, and afterwards induced them to make the amende honorable by going, in form, to his house: 'Ecce illico (says he) etiam magistratus ipse, cum suis insignibus, domum nostram ingressi, talibus monitis delinire gestiunt, Neque tunc dignitati,' &c.

Certainly the Apostle was fully justified in acting with the spirit he did—not for the sake of a mere point of personal privilege or honour, but from a sense of duty, in order to assert the dignity of the law, and prevent its being similarly violated in the case of others; but, above all, to vindicate the character and reputation of himself and Silas, intimately connected as they were with the honour and furtherance of the Gospel.

38. ἐφοβήθησαν ἀκούσαντες ὅτι Ῥ. α.] Well, indeed, they might; since the punishment for such a violation of the privilege of a Roman citizen was of the severest kind.

39. παρεκάλεσαν α.] 'besought them,' not to seek legal redress of the injury.

40. εἰσῆλθον πρὸς τὴν Α.] Some stumble at this idiom, and would read Λυδίας. But to this the MSS. afford no countenance; and it has been proved by Wolf, Kypke, and Valckn., that εἰσερχεσθαι εἰς τινα is not unfrequently used in the sense 'to enter into any one's house.' So Plut. p. 237, εἰς Φειδωλὸν εἰσελθὼν, and Lysias, Orat. 2, εἰς ὑμᾶς δ' εἰσελθὼν ἐλπίζω τῶν δικαίων ταῦξεσθαι. For εἰς, 6 uncials, and many cursives, including all the Lamb. and Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16, have πρὸς, which has been adopted by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., in deference to whose united suffrages I have now admitted the word, espec. since the use with πρὸς occurs at Mark xv. 43. Acts x. 3. xvii. 2. Rev. iii. 20, and in the Class. writers. It was first altered to εἰς, as being by far the most frequent use.

— παρακαλεῖσθαι] The term here seems to have the united sense of admonishing and exhorting, and, perhaps, comforting. See note on 2 Cor. i. 4.

XVII. 1. ἡ συναγωγὴ τῶν Ἰ.] Bp. Middl. and Mr. Green object to our English Version, 'a synagogue of the Jews,' and would render, 'where was the synagogue of the Jews' inhabiting those parts. One might suppose that the ἡ has crept in (as often elsewhere) from the ἡν preceding. Indeed, it is absent from MSS. A, C, D, and not a few cursives, and is cancelled by Lachm., but without sufficient authority; and consequently the ἡ must be retained as genuine, and it was probably absorbed in the ἡν.

2, 3. διελέγετο—παρατιθ.] 'he discoursed unto them out of the Scriptures,' i. e. drawing from them his arguments, proofs, and illustrations. Comp. Ælian, V. H. iii. 19, ὁ δὲ Ξενοκράτης ἀκούσας, παραχρῆμα ἤκε πρὸς Πλάτωνα, καὶ κατέλιβε διαλεγόμενον τοῖς ἐν αὐτῷ. The next words, διανοίγων and παρατ. [at which supp. γραφὰς from γραφῶν preceding] have reference to the two principal parts of ratiocination: 1. opening out and bringing to light truth; 2. laying down and propounding various data, so as, from a collation of particulars, to deduce some general conclusion.

4. προσεκληρῶθησαν τῷ Π.] The verb has a reciprocal sense, 'joined themselves to,' 'took their lot with.'

— γυναικῶν τῶν πρώτων] Answering to the τῶν εὐσεβησάντων infra v. 12, and xiii. 50 'honourable matrons, wives or widows.' Thus Apuleius speaks of feminae primales. This I find confirmed by Theopomp. Hist. l. xvi. ap. Athen. p. 444, πολλὰς γυναῖκας εὐγενεῖς, καὶ τῶν πρώτων, ἥσαν.

5. For the text. rec. ζηλώσαντες δι οἱ ἀπ. Ἰ. I have now been induced to adopt with all the Editors, from Matth. and Griesb. downwards, προσλαβόμενοι δι οἱ Ἰ. Alf. adverts to the various interpolations or insertions of the Critics, which must have left the text in a strange state. Then, he adds, 'the whole was combined, and variously arranged by copyists.' But the copyists never had a hand in such work:—that was reserved for the revisers of the middle ages. As for the principal interpolation, ζηλώσαντες, that, I imagine, came from a marginal gloss, and was, I suspect, introduced by those who had in mind supra vii. 9, and perhaps Wisd. ii. 24, φθόνος τοῦ Διαβόλου θάνατος εἰσῆλθεν εἰς τὸν κόσμον. It is true, that the authority for the text is not strong; but I am enabled to confirm it from all the Lamb. copies except one; and some Mus. copies.

— τῶν ἀγοραίων] Meaning, by a use of the term, on which see my Recens. Synop. and Gr. Lex., 'persons of a mean sort,' like what Xen. calls ἀγοραίων ὄχλον. The following term πονηροὺς is used to further develop the sense (comp. Thucyd. viii. 73, μοχθηροὺ ἀνθρ. διὰ πονηρίαν); and accordingly Aristoph. conjoins both terms, Eq. 181, where μέγας γίγνεσθαι is opposed πονηρὸς καὶ ἀγοραῖς εἶναι. And so in Xen. and Thucyd. the πολίται πονηροὶ are often opposed to the οἱ χρηστοί, the better sort.

— τὸν δῆμον] Not 'the people,' as E. V.; much less 'the mob,' as Doddr. renders; but the popular assembly: a signification frequent in Thucyd. Xen., and the best writers.

6. ἔσυρον] See note supra viii. 3. Πολιτάρχας, 'the city magistrates;' a form of later Grecism, for πολιτάρχους. See a Greek Inscription (No. 1967, cited by Con. and Hows.) found on an arch at Thessalonica, where are found three of the names which occur here, or which are mentioned in St. Paul's Epistles as his companions.

— τὴν οἰκ. ἀναστατώντας] This expression is to be taken in a popular sense, and not to be too rigorously interpreted.—ἀναστ. is a word only found elsewhere in the LXX. It is for ἀνάστατον ποιήσαντες in the Class. writers. There, however, it is used in the physical sense, of destroying and expelling any people from their country; while here, and infra xxi. 38, it is employed, like our 'turn upside down,' to signify 'excite to commotion.'—ἡ οἰκουμένη is here, as at xix. 27, and xxiv. 5, to be taken, in a popular sense, for a wide extent of country, about Asia Minor, embracing much of the civilized Roman world. Comp. Plut. Ages. 36, δόξεῖ ἐμπειρηκότα τὴν οἰκ.

7. ὑποδέδεκται] meaning, 'has received as guests and friends.' So in Luke xix. 6. James ii. 25, and often in the Classical writers.

8. I have placed a comma after ὄχλον, because ἐτάραξαν is used in two senses, as applied to the two nouns, τὸν ὄχλον and τοὺς πολιτάρχας. In the former use it signifies perturbed, thrown into commotion; in the latter, troubled, viz. lest they should not be able to preserve the peace of the city. See xix. 40, comp. with Matt. ii. 3.

9. καὶ λαβ. τὸ ἱκανόν] Τὸ ἱκανὸν λαβεῖν is a Greek translation of the Latin law phrase satisfactionem accipere, 'to take surety,' the opposite to which is ἱκανὸν δοῦναι. The purport of the engagement (whether by bail, or otherwise) probably was, that he would send away Paul and Silas forthwith, and would undertake to keep the peace.

11. εὐγενέστεροι] Not, 'more noble' (for the men were probably but tradesmen), but rather 'the better sort of people,' 'the more respectable;' as Chrysostom seems to have taken the expression by explaining it ἱπικαιότεροι, which word is so used in Xen. Hist. i. 1. 21, and Thucyd. viii. 93, ἀνθρώπου ἱπικαίτε, where see my note. However, it seems that Luke meant the word to be taken in its figurative sense, as denoting a quality of mind and heart,— 'of more generous disposition, raised above prejudice, and disposed to candid inquiry into the truth;' a sense of εὐγενής, found not only in Joseph. and Philo, but also in Plato.

— τὸ καθ' ἡμέραν] sc. ἔθες, 'in their daily course of life, and habitual action.'—ἀνακρίνοντες is = ἀνερυνῶντες, on which see my Lex.

13. σαλεύοντες] 'agitating.' How it comes to mean this, see my Lex.

14. πορ. ὡς ἐπὶ τὴν θάλασσαν] Markland asks, 'to what sea?' and would read Θεσσαλίαν. His query, however, may be readily answered. In the case of places situated, like Beroea, between two seas, to go to the sea must denote to the nearest sea; and if embarkation for a voyage be implied, the nearest sea-port may be supposed. That, in the present case, was probably Πύdna. Thus, in a kindred passage of Thucyd. i. 137, Admetus, to remove Themistocles out of the reach of those who were seeking his life, sends him ἐπὶ τὴν ἰτέραν θάλασσαν, which must mean the Ægean; and, as we afterwards learn, to Πύdna. But had τὴν θάλασσαν simply been written, the Adriatic must have been understood.

The ὡς ἐπὶ our English translators render 'as if to,' or 'as it were to;' which compels them to suppose that this going to the sea was only a stratagem to deceive his enemies, who might suppose he was taking ship, when he, in fact, meant to go to his destination by land. The ὡς, however, is but a slender foundation on which to erect such a notion. There can be no doubt that the two words ὡς ἵπρι are to be taken together, and understood according to the sense of the expression in many passages of Class. writers cited by the Commentators, where the ὡς is usually thought pleonastic, but in fact denotes 'direction towards.' See numerous examples cited in my Recens. Synop. I am still of the same opinion, that Pydna was the place where Paul embarked for Athens; and to this I find Canon Tate assents. It is true, that Con. and Hows. fix on Dium. Why they reject Pydna is, 'because,' they say, 'Pydna was not a sea-port, and for other reasons.' What those others are I cannot imagine. Pydna was much nearer than Diium, and was as much a port; each being merely a river-port, formed at the combination of two small streams. Besides, as it was the place of embarkation of Themistocles, there is no reason why it should not have been of St. Paul.

15. καθιστώντες] I would not, with Kuin., consider this as put for προσέμποντες. The two words are far from being synonymous; προσέμπω signifying 'to set any one forward on his way to any place, by accompanying him part of the distance thither; καθίστημι, 'to take charge of any one (as guide and defender) to any place, and there set him down.' So Hom. Od. v. 274, τοὺς μ' ἐκίλευσα Πύλονδ' ἀτασσηῖσαι καὶ ἐφίσσαι. The latter term occurs in Thucyd. iv. 78, κατίστησαν (scil. οἱ ἀγογῆται) αὐτὸν ἐς Δίον, where I have adduced several examples of it. It is true, that Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit καθιστάνοντες, from A, B, D, and one cursive; to which I can add nothing; accordingly, the authority is insufficient to warrant its adoption; though internal evidence is in its favour, from the extreme rarity of the word, which I have found only in Diod. Sic. xv. 33, and xix. 72, in 2 copies; and Joseph. Bell. i. 18, 5, οἱ καθιστανόμενοι.

16. ἐν αὐτῷ] This is added, by a Hebraism, as in Dan. vii. 15, 'I was grieved in my spirit in the midst of my body.'

— θεωροῦντι] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit θεωροῦντος, from 3 uncial MSS., A, B, E, and 20 cursive MSS. (to which I add 2 Lamb., 2 Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B. x. 16), Chrysa., Theophyl., Theod., and Enthl. And, considering that internal evidence is quite in its favour, there is a probability of its being the true reading, notwithstanding the harshness of the construction, requiring αὐτοῦ to be supplied from the preceding.

— κατείδωλον] 'full of idols.' An intensive force of κατὰ found in many words, as κατάδεξις, κατάμπελος, κατάφυτος, &c. With respect to the fact, it is fully established and copiously illustrated by Wetst.; ex. gr. Pausanias says, that 'Athens had more images than all the rest of Greece;' so also Thucyd. ii. 38, speaks of the Athenians as ὡς αἰεὶ διαιτησίαι νομίζοντες, where see my note.

17. τῇ ἀγορᾷ] There were many market-places; but the most considerable were the Ceramicus, or old, and the Forum Eretriacum, or new Forum, mentioned by Strabo; the former of which is supposed by Ikenius and Schlensker to be the one here meant; the latter by Kuin., and most recent Commentators; and with reason; not only because it was fitter for the purpose, as being the most frequented, but also because it was the place where the Stoics held their discourses; where Socrates, and several other philosophers, had held their discussions; and, in fact, where there was usually a concourse of persons who met for conversation.

18. Ἐπικουρίων καὶ τῶν Στ.] The Επίκουροι were practically Atheists; since they held that the world was neither created by God, nor under the direction of his Providence. Pleasure they accounted the summum bonum, and held that virtue was to be practised only for the sake of pleasure, not for its own sake. They maintained that the soul was material, like the body, and would perish with it, leaving nothing to be either hoped or feared after death. As to the Stoics, they did, indeed, believe in the existence of a God, but held such chimerical notions of his nature, attributes, and providence, as rendered that belief almost nugatory. They maintained that both God and man were bound by a necessitas fatalis; that the wise man yielded in no respect to God; of whom they believed that his nature was fire, and diffused throughout the world. On the condition of the soul after death, and on the existence of a state of rewards and punishments, they varied in opinion; but all denied the eternity of a future state. Nay, some thought that, sooner or later, the soul merged in the celestial fire of the Deity. Thus while the former denied the existence, or at least providence, of God, the latter, though professing to believe both, yet, by ascribing all human events to fate, destroyed the foundation of all religion as much as the former. It is obvious that both the above systems were as far as possible removed from the doctrines of Christianity; and therefore it is no wonder that the latter should have been both unaccountable and unacceptable to those philosophers. There were, besides, two other sects, the Platonists and the Peripatetics; the latter of whom probably came not near Paul, since their places of discussion were far removed. The opinions of the former made far nearer approaches than those of the other sects to the doctrines of Christianity; and these probably formed the far greater part of those who gave a qualified approbation of Paul's doctrines, by proposing to 'hear him again' on the subject of the immortality of the soul.

— σπερμ.] The word was used properly of those small birds which live by picking up scattered seeds; but, metaphorically, of those paravers who frequented the market-places, and lived by picking up any scattered or refuse produce; and generally of persons of abject condition, without any certain means of support. Again, as the tribes of small birds which live by picking up seeds are especially garrulous—the word came to denote a babblers. Both senses may here be intended.

— ἐξων δαιμονίων] 'foreign deities,' such as are unknown to the country. So Joe. Ant. i. l. 26, ἐπὶ νεωτερισμῷ καὶ ξενικῶν εἰσαγωγῇ θεῶν, and a little after: ξενικοὺς θεοὺς ἐπιφέρειν. Dio Cass. 1359, 15. θεῶν τινα ξενικῶν εἰς τὴν Ῥώμην εἰσάγαγε. The only passage I have noted in which ἐξων is so used for ξενικὸς is in Ælian, V. H. ii. 13, where it is mentioned as a charge against Socrates by his accusers, that ἐσάγγεξε ξένους δαίμονας, καὶ οὐκ ἔβαι θεοὺς, οὐδὲ ἴδιμα. There is another peculiarity by which the usual propriety in the use of δαίμονια to denote beings holding a rank midway between gods and men, is not observed,—the term being used to denote Deities, as in the words of the indictment against Socrates, as preserved by Xenoph., where we have ἐδίκησε Σωκράτης—καὶνὰ δαιμόνια ἐσφίρειν. Of course, in so using the words, the persons here must, as De Wette remarks, have alluded to the true God—the God of the Jews, and Jesus Christ, his Son, the Creator of the world (v. 24), and the Person appointed by God to be the Judge of it (v. 31). That so many distinguished scholars should have taken ἀνάστασις to mean a goddess, is truly extraordinary, espec. since that interpretation is forbidden by v. 31, ἀναστήσας αὐτὸν ἐκ νεκρῶν, and 32, ἀκούσαντες ἀνάστασιν νεκρῶν.

19. ἐπιλαβόμενοι αὐτοῦ] Commentators are not agreed whether this expression is to be regarded as importing violence, or not. Examples of both uses occur in the New Test. The former, however, may seem agreeable to the context. And it is countenanced by the fact, that the Areopagus was a tribunal for the trial of impiety, such as the introducing of the worship of foreign deities. Yet it may be doubted whether there was any thing of apprehension, properly so called, since there is no appearance of any regular trial before the court of Areopagus. There is, indeed, reason to think, that this court retained but a shadow of its ancient consequence, and had abated much of its ancient severity in matters of religion, otherwise foreign deities would not have been so worshipped as they then were at Athens. A stronger proof of which cannot be imagined than the following passage of Aristoph. in his Horn, cited by Athen. l. ix. p. 372, where, —after speaking of the abundance of every kind of produce supplied by the season (so Thucyd. ii. 38, ἐπιστρέφεται ἐκ πάσης γῆς τὰ πάντα, where see my note), in such a manner that whatever was wanted could be had at any season, and one could scarcely tell what time of the year it was, —this bounty of nature and the gods is ascribed by a speaker to the piety of the Athenians: Τούτοις ὑπάρχει ταῦτ', ἐπειδὴ τοὺς θεοὺς σέβουσιν. To this it is replied by another who censures the fondness of the Athenians for foreign superstitions, *Ἀτίλανσαν ἄρα σέβοντας ὑμᾶς, ὡς σὺ φῆς· Τίητί (why?) Αἰγυπτίους αὐτῶν τὴν πόλιν πεποιήκασ' (so I read from MS. C for πεποίηκας) ἀντ' Ἀθηνῶν; 'why then have they made their city an Egypt, instead of Athens?' i. e. by filling Athens as full of gods as Egypt.*

The words ἐπιλαβόμενοι—ἤγαγον then, taken in conjunction with the preceding verse, suggest the idea of any thing rather than a regular trial. The people, it should seem, thought proper to call Paul to something like a public accusant; and considered no place so proper as the hill of judgment called Areopagus; thus the words just after, δυνάμεθα γινῶναι, as also βουλόμεθα γινῶναι, in which form, however, there is more of courtesy than of authoritativeness. It is observable, too, that the Apostle does not address them as judges,—nor seek any justification of his conduct,—but as philosophers. This may account for the little seriousness, or ceremony, which the Apostle met with.

21. The words of this verse are a remark meant to illustrate the καινὴ and ξενίχ. just before, and may, as Alf. thinks, have been derived from Paul himself. As to the expression ἐπιδημ. ζῖνοι, the distinction between the δῆτοι and ζῖνοι was no where more strongly marked than at Athens. The δῆτοι considered themselves as alone possessing any rank, while all the rest were included indiscriminately under the name ζῖνοι. They called themselves the αὐτοχθόνες, or first inhabitants; the rest they styled ἐπιδημ., or new comers. There was, however, a class between one and the other, called μέτοικοι, sojourners, who had a sort of quasi-civitas. Now, it has been debated whether by οἱ μούντες ξένοι, εἰς οὐδὲν ἕτερον εὐκαίρουν, ἢ λέγειν τι καὶ ἀκούειν καινότερον.

ἱπιδ. ξένοι are to be understood all the ξένοι, or only the μέτοικοι, or both of them. Kypke and Kuinoel adopt the second view; and rightly; for though ξένων might include both (so Thucyd. ii. 36, τὸν ὅμιλον καὶ ἀστών καὶ ξένων), yet since ἱπιδιμ. is here added, and as the difference between the μέτοικοι and the ξένοι was, that the former were regular residents of the city, and accordingly obliged to take the oath of allegiance, and participate in military service, the latter were merely sojourners, drawn thither by business or pleasure.

— εἰς οὐδὲν ἕτερον εὐκαίρουν] ‘nulli rei magis vacabant.’ Εὐκαιρ. is here used for σχολάζειν, by a use confined to the later writers. The next words are graphic, and point at the chief traits of the Athenian character,—garrulity, and rage for novelty. Inasmuch that at Athens there were places called λέσχαί, appropriated to the reception of newsmongers.

Καινότερον is regarded by most Expositors as an example of the Compar. for the Posit. Yet in such cases the Compar. is seldom without its force, though it may not be easy to express it in translating. Here the examples adduced by Commentators are not quite to the purpose; because in those the sentence is interrogative. They might more appositely have cited Joseph. Bell. i. 18, 1, τοῖς ὀργάνοις ἀντιμηχανώμενοι αἰετὶ κώλυμα καινότερον. In the present case the full sense probably is, ‘to tell or hear the latest news.’ So Eurip. Orest. 1327, τί δὲ νεώτερον λέγεις; the sense seems to be, ‘What is the latest news you have to tell?’ So Shaks. Macb., ‘What’s the newest grief?’ Theophrast., περὶ καλιᾶς, where the babbling newsmonger asks, μή λέγεται τι καινότερον;

22. In this brief but forcible address, full of apostolic wisdom (which would doubtless have been longer, had it not been broken off by the scoffs of some, and the listlessness and abrupt departure of others), the Apostle wisely accommodates himself to the circumstances of his hearers; thus becoming a Gentile to the Gentiles, to win the Gentiles to the Gospel. After a complimentary exordium (such as was usual in publicly addressing the Athenians), he notices the occasion which led to his addressing them, and shows that it is his desire to enable them to satisfy their wish of worshipping even unknown gods, by pointing out that great Being (to them hitherto unknown) who is THE ONLY AND THE TRUE GOD, some of whose chief attributes, together with his various benefits, both of creation and providence, the Apostle then proceeds to enumerate. And here we may notice the admirable address, by which a seemingly plain statement of the first principles of natural religion is made acceptable to persons of the most opposite description, and highly instructive, by being aimed at the errors of each. Thus, by adverting to the works of God in creation, the Apostle means to censure the dogmas of the Epicureans; and by what he says of the providential care of God over all things, he glances at the opinions of the Stoics and Epicureans: finally, in speaking of sacrifices, temples, and the creation of man, he reproves the superstition of the ignorant multitude. He shows where each party was right, and where both parties were wrong; directing his words as well against the irreligious scepticism of the higher ranks, as the grovelling superstition of the inferior classes.

Having thus established the existence of one God and Father of all mankind, the Apostle infers the duty incumbent on God’s creatures, of ‘seeking,’ i.e. worshipping him; and at the same time notices certain erroneous modes of worship, which had originated in utter ignorance of the true nature of the Deity. This introduces an exhortation to abandon these errors, strengthened by an announcement of a future day of judgment and punishment for all wilful disobedience to the Divine will. Now this implied a present state of accountableness, and the duty incumbent upon his hearers of guiding themselves by the light of that Gospel, which God had been pleased to reveal by Jesus Christ.

— δεισιδαιμονιστέρους] The sense most commonly assigned, ‘too superstitious,’ can by no means be defended,—that would imply (what surely could not be intended) that there may be a degree of superstition that is good; besides, that is, as Alf. observes, ‘to miss the delicate tact of the address, by which Paul parries the charge against him, and, in so doing, introduces the great Truth which he came to preach.’ The most eminent Expositors for the last century have been of opinion, as was Chrys. and others of the ancients, that δεισιδ. is here employed in the good acceptance,—to denote ‘very religious,’ i.e. ‘attentive to religion;’ or, as Alf., ‘carrying their religious reverence very far.’ That the expression will bear this sense, has been established by a multitude of proofs; and that the Athenians were very attentive to religious observances has been proved on the testimonies of the ancient writers of every kind—dramatists, historians, and philosophers; especially Pausan., Attic. 24, seq., Ἀθηναῖοις περισσώτερόν τι ἢ τοῖς ἄλλοις ἐστὶ τὰ θεῶ ἐστι σπουδή. See also note at v. 19. That such is the sense intended in the present passage, is plain from the air of the context, and will appear by a consideration of the circumstances in which the Apostle was then placed. To a people like the Athenians, so scrupulously observant of all the rules of courtesy on such occasions of public address, it were surely far more probable that the Apostle (with that discretion which ever tempered his zeal) should here have chosen to commence with the language of conciliation, rather than abrupt rebuke. Nevertheless, we shall, perhaps, not err, if we suppose that St. Paul purposely selected the ambiguous term δεισιδ., because he could not conscientiously use εὐσεβής; since the gods whom they worshipped were, in his estimation, demons. So 1 Cor. x. 20, ὅτι ἡ θύη ἡ ἰθνη δαιμονίους θύει, καὶ οὐ Θεῶ. And yet, as δαίμονες properly meant gods of a certain kind, the hint would not be pointed. The Apostle, then, commends their worshipping, but shows that they 'worship they know not what' (John iv. 22), meaning, that 'they are very religious in their way.' However, I agree with Mr. Alford that their exceeding veneration for religion [so the Pesch. Syr. expresses the sense] is laid hold of as a fact, on which Paul engrafts his proof that he is introducing no new gods, but enlightening them as to an Object of worship, on which they were confessedly in the dark.

23. διερχόμενος καὶ ἀναθεωρῶν τὰ σεβ. ὑμῶν] By ἀναθ. is meant, 'surveying with attention;' and by σεβ. 'the objects of your worship,' as shown in temples, altars, images, sacrifices, &c.; as in 2 Thesa. ii. 4. Wisd. xiv. 20, and sometimes in the Class. writers. As Paul contemplated the sublime scene which then must have met the eyes of the beholder from the lofty hill of the Areiopagus, so it may be not unuseful to figure it to our mental eye, and share in the feelings which filled the Apostle's heart. 'He would not fail,' as observes Mr. Humphrey, 'to be deeply impressed with the magnificence of the religion which he sought to destroy;—the grandest temples in the world were then under his eye.' See a very finely written passage which I have extracted, in my Supplementary Volume, from an eloquent discourse by the Rev. J. Angell James, preached before the Missionary Society, May 12, 1819. I cannot, however, quite agree with the Preacher, that 'Paul in his present position on the hill of Areiopagus stood so utterly insensible, as he represents, to all the grandeur of the scene, or absorbed in the abstraction of his own mind, as to see no charms,' &c. That were to suppose him to be, what we know him not to have been, a very Stoic. We have no reason to suppose that his warm heart could have shown such utter, almost senseless indifference. His feeling was chiefly that of holy indignation, indignant grief, at the dishonour his hearers were doing to the only true God; mixed, however, with almost utter hopelessness of bringing these learned and accomplished worshippers of stocks and stones to a right mind. So κατείδωλοι, 'idol-ridden,' did he find them. Inasmuch that it is evident the Apostle's intention was not originally to have preached the tidings of salvation to them, intending only to stop at Athens till his two companions from Berea had joined him; and, meanwhile, to confine his ministrations to the Jews and the Jewish proselytes; except any Athenian passers-by, during his addresses to them in the public square, should haply stop and listen to his discourse; as was the case, we find, with some Epicureans and Stoics. And, being brought by them to the Areiopagus, in order, it seems, to answer the interrogations of the philosophers, Paul most judiciously thought fit to address the Athenians at large,—though the result proved how justly he had estimated the unfitness of the Athenian people to receive even the doctrine of a pure Theism, with which he so wisely commenced his discourse. Accordingly, when he was proceeding, we may suppose, to introduce some of the plainer doctrines of the Gospel of Christ, he was

— ἌΓΝΩΣΤΩ ΘΕΩ.] These words have occasioned no little perplexity to Biblical Interpreters. The difficulty hinges on this—that, although we find from Pausan. i. l. v. 14, and Philostr. Vit. Ap. vi. 3, that there were at Athens altars inscribed 'to unknown gods,' yet no passage is adduced, which makes mention of any altar 'to an unknown god.' Now Jerome, Erasmus, and others would remove this difficulty by supposing that the inscription in question was Ἀγνώστοι Θεοί, or rather Θεοί Ἀσίας καὶ Εὐρώπης καὶ Λιβύης, Θεοὶ ἀγνώστοι καὶ ξίνοις. But, as Bp. Middl. observes, 'that is a most improbable supposition; and, indeed, the manner in which the inscription is introduced makes it incredible that St. Paul could intend so remote or vague an allusion.' Therefore, 'that the altar (as the Bishop remarks) was inscribed simply Ἀγνώστῳ Θεῷ, must either be conceded, or all inquiry will be in vain.' And, as Baronius and Wonna have observed, 'though there might be several altars at Athens and elsewhere inscribed to unknown gods generally, or to the unknown gods of any particular part of the world, yet that there might occasionally be one inscribed to one of them, is extremely probable.' Or we may, with Winer, reconcile the discrepancy by urging, that it does not follow that each altar mentioned by Pausanias and Philostr. had its inscription in the plural, —Θεοὶ ἀγνώστοι, but that the plural has been used to suit βωμοί, and that the inscription on each was, as here, ἀγνώστῳ Θεῷ. As to the passage of Lucian, Philop. 9 and 29, πρὸς τὸν ἀγνώστον ἐν Ἀθήναις, I have already proved at large, that, since the Tract is manifestly spurious, and the reference to the present passage (with twenty others) quite manifest, the testimony is worthless, except to confirm the reading,—as we have it, in the Singular. The question, however, as Bp. Middl. observes, is, 'was this inscription meant to be applied to one of a possible multitude,—or was it meant to be significant of the one true God?' He maintains that the latter opinion (though the general one) is ungrounded. It involves, he thinks, a great improbability, that an inscription so offensive to a polytheistical people could have been tolerated. Nay, he affirms that it is inconsistent with the propriety of the Article, and maintains that the omission of the Article, the position of the words, as also the rules of ordinary language, and the custom of inscriptions, alike require that the words should be rendered, 'to an unknown god,' or 'to a god unknown.' He asserts that the discourse of the Apostle is, even according to that way of taking ἀγνώστῳ, very pertinent, and that the mention of any unknown deity gave him a sufficient handle for the purpose in question. However, on the supposition that the sense is 'to an unknown god,' we are encountered with the difficulty, how it could happen that an altar should have been so inscribed. The best solution of which is, that it had been erected by the Athenian people, in acknowledgment of some signal benefit received by the city at large, which seemed attributable to some god, though to whom was uncertain. If this were the case, there would be little difficulty in supposing (with Chrysostom, Theophylact, and Isidore, of the ancients, and several learned moderns), that the benefit in question was the removal of the pestilence, which almost depopulated Athens, so finely described by Thucydides. And this is thought to be proved by Diogenes Laert. i. 10. Yet (waving the fabulousness of the story) we may observe, that he says nothing about an unknown god, but only represents the altars as erected θεῷ προσήκοντι. And so far from being inscribed θεῷ ἀγνώστῳ, he says they were ἀνώνυμοι, without any inscription. Indeed, these Βεσολὶ ἀνώνυμοι, or four-sided stone altars without inscription of any deity, were common in Greece. To suppose that the one at Athens here meant had such an inscription, is too hypothetical to be admitted. That there were altars at Athens inscribed θεοῖς ἀγνόστοις καὶ ξίνοις, is nothing to the present purpose; since the union of ξίνοις with ἀγνόστοις alters the allusion in ἀγν., and the passage merely attests that the Athenians were much attached to foreign superstitions; so much so, that from Hesychius we learn that there was at Athens a festival called θεοξένια, on which worship was paid to the gods in general, both of their country and foreign ones, called θεοὶ ξένοκοί. If it be asked, to whom, then, was the altar in question inscribed? I answer, to the one true God, the Creator and Lord of all things; which, indeed, seems to be required by the course of argument in the passage, as is ably traced by Wonna, in his Dissertation on the subject, vol. ii. p. 464 of the Thesaurus Theolog. Philol.; and so the Peach. Syr. Translator took it. This, he shows, was also the opinion of Clemens Alex. and Augustine, of the ancient Commentators; and, of the modern ones, of Baronius, Menochius, and Heinsius. To which names may be added Cudworth, Intell. Syst. i. 4, 18, and Bp. Warburton. From what the former says,—and espec. from what is adduced by the latter, in Sect. 4. l. ii. of his Divine Legation,—it is plain that the ancient philosophers of Egypt, Greece, and Rome, were well acquainted with the doctrine of the Unity of the Godhead, to inculcate which was the grand end of the Mysteries, where (as he has shown) the errors of Polytheism were detected, and the doctrine of the Unity taught and explained. As to Bp. Middleton's argument, that the 'inscription would have been too offensive to Polytheists to be allowed to stand,' it is of no great force; for it is well known how tolerant the people of Athens then were; and we may suppose that the inscription was worded by philosophers,—who had been initiated in the greater Mysteries,—and with such discreet ambiguity, by the omission of the article, as to leave it uncertain whether it was meant to express one out of many, or the one alone true God. After all, however, it may justly be considered an open question, whether the one true God was meant by the inscribers, or an unknown god. And I am not disinclined to think, with Mr. Alf., that the anecdote recorded in the passage of Diog. Laert. furnishes a key to the practice of inscribing altars ἀγνώστῳ θεῷ, by enabling us to suppose, that, on the occurrence of any remarkable calamity, or deliverance, not assignable to the conventionally received agency of any of the recognized deities, 'an unknown god' was revered as their author.

— ὃν οὖν ἀγνοοῦντες εὐσ., τούτου] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit δ and τούτο, from A, B, D (to which I cannot add a single copy from the Lamb. and Mus. or the Trin. Coll. B, x. 16, MSS.), with the Vulg., Orig., and Jerome. But so very slender an authority (and the Beza collation of B testifies that the MS. has neither δν nor δ) is not weighty enough to authorize a change of text, unless where internal evidence is decidedly against the reading rejected; which is not here the case. And while Alf. pronounces the δν and τούτον to have been 'alterations from reverential motives,' and, on the other hand, De Wette and Meyer affirm the masculines δν and τούτον to have been alterations to produce the sense, the Deity, and to avoid the inference, that Paul identified 'the unknown god' with the Creator, we may be allowed to leave these fine-spun sophisms to the concoctors respectively, and retain a reading found in all the copies but two (one of them notoriously unfaithful), confirmed by the Peach. Syr. and all other ancient Versions, and many ancient Greek Fathers, as Clemens Alex., Athan., Chrys., Theoph., the Caten. Oxon., and Cyrill., and of the Latin Fathers, Augustine. As for the Alex. MS., the O was evidently an error of the scribes, who has written the N just over the O, and the N just over the O in τούτο. That the N came from the original writer all collators are agreed. Thus the external authority for the reading in question is reduced to next to nothing.

— δν εὐσεβ.] The rare construction with the Accus. occurs also at 1 Tim. v. 4, and in Jos. Antt. x. 3, 2, τὸν Θεόν. Bell. ii. 8, 7, τὸ Θεῶν. Eur. Phœn. 1331, χθόνιον εὐσ. Θεόν. Jos. Antt. xx. 2, 4, τὸν Θεόν. Inscript. ap Boeckh. i. p. 334, εὐσ. τὸν Θεόν. Plut. Moral. p. 20, D, τοὺς θεούς.

24. ὁ Θεὸς ὁ ποιήσας τὸν κόσμον.] In order to draw his hearers away from Polytheism and idolatry, Paul proceeds to show the nature and proper worship of the one true God. And first he speaks of the Deity as the Creator of the world; and thus he impugns the opinions of their philosophers,—either that there were many gods, or that matter was eternal, and the world formed by a fortuitous concourse of atoms. Against this is directed Paul's position, that the world and all that it contains were created by one God, who is, accordingly, the Lord and Ruler of heaven and earth. It is well observed by Roos, cited by Stier, 'that the true doctrine of Creation is the proper refutation of all idolatry; hence (remarks Stier) it is no wonder that the Devil should, in order to diffuse idolatry, have obliterated among all heathen nations the recognition of Creation.' And he adds, with much truth, that 'only on the firm foundation of the Old Test. doctrine of Creation can we

— οὐκ ἐν χειρῶν, &c.] See note supra vii. 48.

25. οὐδὲ—θεραπεύεται 'is not served, has no need to be served, by the hands of men;' i. e. by temples, sacrifices, &c. Such, indeed, is the primary sense of θεραπεύω. See my note on Thucyd. ii. 51, No. 5.

— ὑπὸ χειρῶν ἀνθρώπων] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ὑπὸ χειρῶν ἀνθρωπίνων, from 3 uncial and 15 cursive MSS., to which I can only add Lamb. 1182. But internal evidence is against it, from its being, not, as Alf. says, an error of the scribes, but an alteration of the Critical Correctors, of which the purpose was to introduce a more Classical form of expression. As to the other reading, it is more recommended by its simplicity and Hebraistic idiom, and confirmed by Matt. xxvi. 47. Mark ix. 31. Luke ix. 44.

— διδούς πᾶσι ζωὴν καὶ πν.—καὶ τὰ πάντα] It is strange that Mill. Matth., and some other Editors, should adopt the reading κατὰ πάντα, found in all the early editions and very many MSS. (including all the Lamb. copies except one, and some Mus. copies; also Trin. Coll. B, x. 16, and Steph., confirmed by τὰ πάντα in 1 Chron. xix. 14); for it is susceptible of no tolerable sense, while that of τὰ πάντα yields an excellent one,—namely, in other words, 'both the breath of life, and all those things [which are necessary to the support of life].' It is, in short, as Meyer and Alf. have seen, 'an error;' but not occasioned, as Meyer thinks, from the κατὰ πάντα, at ver. 22, being still in the copyist's mind, but simply from καὶ κατὰ being continually confounded by the scribes. At προσδεόμενος there is an ellipsis of ὡς, since, in fact, the apposition includes that sense.

Here, then, it is shown that, as to sacrifices, offerings, or gifts, the Deity wants them not, nor is he propitiated by receiving them; for all things that men enjoy are derived from him, as their Author and Preserver; a truth interesting to us Christians, but not so as that contained in 2 Mace. xiv. 35, ὅ, Κύριε, τῶν ὅλων ἀπροσδεῖς ὑπάρχων, εὐδόκησας ναὸν τῆς σῆς κατασκευάσας ἐν ἡμῖν γενέσθαι.

26. ἓξ ἐνὸς αἵματος 'of one kindred,' or 'race;' as 2 Sam. xxi. 1, and Joseph. Bell. ii. 6, 3, ἱσμεῖν ἀδελφοὶ καὶ κοινὸν αἷμα. See note on John i. 13. Wetst. compares from Anth. Gr. iii. 31, 6, Ἀστιά—ἐνὸς αἵματος, and Virg., 'anguine ab uno.'

By thus tracing back the origin of mankind from Adam, the Apostle partly means to check the vanity of the Athenians, who maintained that they were αὐτοχθόνες and γεννηαῖς. But his chief aim was, as Stier and Alford point out, to controvert the whole genius of Polytheism, which attributed to the nations different mythical origins, and separate guardian gods. For Vulg. προστεταγμένους, I have, with almost all Editors, adopted the reading προσσταγμένους, which, besides numerous MSS., is confirmed by Jonah ii. 1. iv. 7, 9, and Plut. p. 758, κατὰ χρόνους προσσταγμένους. Render: 'having appointed certain determinate periods [for their inhabiting], and the boundaries of the regions they should inhabit.' There seems a reference to the records of the early colonization and settling of the earth, in the books of Moses.

27. The Apostle now suggests the grand design of man's creation,—namely, ζητεῖν τὸν Κύριον,—to worship and obey his Maker. For Κύριον, however, A, B, G, H, and not a few cursives (including 2 Lamb. and 2 Mus. copies), have Θεόν, which is edited by Griesb. Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; and it may be the true reading; but external evidence that it is insufficient, and internal evidence is not in its favour. Alford regards Κύριον as an error of scribes, who do indeed often confound the words; but thus the argument draws two ways, and no determination can be reached; and, accordingly, that fact must be kept out of count. For my own part, I quite agree with Matthæi, that Θεόν arose from the correction of Critics, who thought, as do De Wette and Meyer, that Paul would not have used the word Κύριον when addressing heathens; whereas the Person whom he here meant by Κύρ. would be sufficiently plain to them from supra v. 24, οὗτος οὐρανοῦ καὶ γῆς Κύριος ὑπάρχων. As for the Syr., Vulg., and Æthiopic Versions, which are adduced for Θεόν, they only express, as on so many other occasions, the general sense. The Arab. and the Sahid., however, have Κύριον, not Θεόν, as Tisch. and Alf. say. Thus it appears that Κύριον is the more difficult reading, and more likely to be changed, and is, accordingly, more likely to be genuine. As to the reading καὶ γε, adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from B, D, G, H, and many cursives (to which I can add all the Lamb. MSS. except one, but the best, 1182), I cannot receive it. The very reading καίτοι, for which there is considerable authority, confirms, as Meyer says, the καίτοι γε. Besides, though Luke elsewhere uses καὶ γε (Luke ii. 18. xix. 22), yet not in a sense here suitable; for the et quidem of Alford mars the Apostle's reasoning, which requires 'and yet, indeed,' 'although, indeed;' as in John iv. 2, and in Luke himself, supra xiv. 17, in a quite kindred passage, where Paul, addressing the heathens, says, καὶ τοι γε οὐκ ἀμάρτυρον ἑαυτὸν ἀφῆκεν, where the uncials A, B, C, D, E, desert the text. rec., but Alford retains it (with Tisch.), pronouncing 'the readings καὶ τοι and καὶ γε corrections; the γε, or the τοι, being deemed unnecessary,'—the very case here.

— εἰ ἄρα γε ψηλ., &c.] These words are exegetical of the foregoing; and the sense is, '[trying] if haply they could, by the glimmering light of reason, feel out and find him;' Paul may, as Dr. Hales thinks, have had in mind a passage of Plato, Phaed. § 47, where he censures those who feel after God in the dark, by resting in second causes, without carrying up their inquiries to that first Cause; consequently worshipping the creature, rather than the Creator. The Philosopher probably had in mind Aristoph. Pac. 691, πρὸτον μὲν οὐ—ἰψηλαφῶμεν ἐν σκότειν ταῖς πράγματι—νυνὶ δ' ἅπαντα πρὸς λύχνον βουλούμεν. Perhaps, however, the similarity of the passages of Plato and Paul is purely accidental; the Apostle merely adverting, by a popular figure, to the less distinct evidences of natural religion, as opposed to the clear ones of Revelation; see ver. 30.

— οὐ μακρὰν ἀπὸ] A litotes; the Deity being near, by these plain indications of his creating and preserving power. Comp. Jos. Antt. viii. 4, 2, where, in the prayer of Solomon at the dedication of the Temple, it is said: καὶ πεπισμένοι διατελοῦμεν, ὅτι πάροι, καὶ μακρὰν οὐκ ἀφίστηκας ἀκούει.

²⁸ ἐν αὐτῷ, &c.] Many here recognize, in the three verbs, ζῶμεν, κιν., and ἐσμέν, a climax. But it rather seems to be a strong mode of expression for 'to him we owe life, and every faculty connected with it; by him we are what we are;' implying the absolute dependence of man on God for every thing that he has, or is. So Eurip. Alc. 290, ἐν σοὶ δ' ἐσμέν καὶ ζῆν καὶ μῆ.

— τοῦ γὰρ καὶ γένος ἐσμέν] These words occur both in Aratus, Phæn. 5, and in a hymn of Cleantes on Jupiter, v. 5, which see in full in my Rec. Syn. Similar sentiments, too, are found in other ancient writers; as Pind. Nem. Od. 6, ἐν ἀνδρῶν, ἐν θεῶν γένος, and Plato, p. 24, γεννήματα θεῶν ὄντας ἀνθρώπους. Considering that these words of St. Paul are found in both Aratus and Cleantes, some Commentators suppose the allusion to be to both; this being, they think, required by the τίνες τῶν ποιητῶν. That, however, will not certainly prove that the reference may not be to one, and probably Cleantes. See Con. and How. So in Thucyd. i. 13, it is said, ὡς καὶ τοῖς παλαιοῖς ποιηταῖς δεδιόλωται, though the allusion is evidently to one only, namely, Homer.

²⁹ γίνον οὖν ὑπάρχοντες, &c.] meaning, 'If, then, man be God's handy-work, or creation, as your own poet says; sure it must be absurd to imagine that God can be man's handy-work, or creation.' (Markl.) Here the Apostle adduces the conclusion, that mankind are bound to worship God THEIR FATHER; and that not with idolatrous, but spiritual worship, as being a spiritual Being (see John iv. 23, 24), and not like images made by human art.

To see the full force of the allusions in χρυσῷ ἢ ἀργύρῳ—ἐνθυμήσεως ἀνθρώπου we must, as Mr. Gifford observes, in his Travels in Greece, recollect that 'below, around, and above the spot where the Apostle stood (the Mars' Hill) there stood innumerable idola, and above all the celebrated colossal statue of Phidias' Athena Polias, in the full view of Paul, on which the highest arts and devices of men, and the most costly materials, had been lavishly expended.'

³⁰, ³¹. The Apostle now points out the subject of his preaching—JESUS AND THE RESURRECTION; to attend to which he excites them by every motive. To call forth their love of God, and hope in Him, he tells them that their past ignorance of his true nature and worship, and their consequent corruption of morals, God was pleased to overlook; but had now sent his Son (that DIVINE Teacher so ardently wished and longed for by the wisest philosophers) to teach men how to worship God aright, and to save them, upon condition of repentance for what was past, and reformation as to the future. To work on their fear of the Divine Majesty, he apprises them that, if they did not listen to the Lord Jesus and his Gospel, they would incur condign punishment at the general resurrection and subsequent judgment held by him.

— παραγγέλλει τοῖς ἀνθρώποις πᾶσι παντ. μετ.] Here παραγγ. is a very strong term, denoting 'the enjoining and requiring, as it were, by public order, or proclamation, a thing to be done.' And this energetic term (quite in the manner of the great Apostle) is further carried out, by the subsequent πᾶσι πανταχοῦ forming a paronomasia, not unfrequent in the Epistles of St. Paul, and found also infra xxiv. 3. By a similar forcible elegance it is said, in Demosth. Phil. iv., πάντων πανταχοῦ; and in Philo, p. 405, πανταχοῦ πάντας; and p. 445, ὅπως πᾶσι τοῖς πανταχοῦ καταγγέλλῃ: which last is strikingly similar to the expression in the present passage. I would observe that Lachm. and Tisch., by editing, for πᾶσι, πάντας, from 4 uncial and 7 cursive MSS., have effectually destroyed the Pauline elegance and force above pointed out, and presented in its place what is, if not positively ungrammatical, yet any thing but pointed and forcible.

³¹ διότι ἔστησεν, &c.] q. d. '[And there is need that you should repent, and reform your lives] for you must give an account,' &c. — ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ: i. e. in such strictness of justice as must exclude all mercy to the impenitent and unreformed.—ἀνδρὶ is (as Ecumenius observes) spoken οἰκονομικῶς, denoting, 'the God-man Jesus,' &c.

—πίστιν παρασχῶν here signifies (as often) 'to produce faith in any thing, or confidence in any one's pretensions,' by adducing sufficient proofs of the existence of the former, or the validity of the latter.

³² οἱ μὲν ἐχλεύαζον] This feeling of contempt for, and ridicule of, the doctrine in question will not appear so strange, when we consider how wholly unaccustomed were men's minds to the notion of a resurrection of the body, and consequently the identity of man in a future state; see the Introduction to 1 Cor. xv. Of this their mythological accounts of Elysium had said nothing. And the thing, at first consideration, involved so much to stagger their faith, that the feeling was, perhaps, natural; but it ought to have been suppressed by the consideration of the omnipotence of the great God who had pleased that 'life and immortality should be brought to light by the Gospel' of Christ.

—ἀκουσόμεθά σου π. π. τ.] Not, it should seem, that they really desired to hear more:—if so, why not then? Hence the feeling must have been one, if not of indifference, like that of Felix, yet falling far short of earnestness. On the whole, the Apostle's reception was so very discouraging, that he, in disgust at those who mocked at the Resurrection, terminated his discourse. Had that not been the case, he would doubtless have enlarged on the nature and requisitions of that religion, whose Divine origin had been thus attested by God himself, by signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds.

XVIII. The Apostle, after having departed from Athens, repairs to Corinth, and there meets with Aquila,—who, on being expelled from Rome, with the other Jews there, had, with his wife Priscilla, retired to that city. To this person, who was a tent-maker, the Apostle, being of the same trade, joins himself, works in his shop, and lodges in his house (vv. 1—3). Silas and Timotheus come to him from Macedonia (ver. 5). After having stayed a year and a half at Corinth (ver. 11), and, notwithstanding the pertinacious opposition of the Jews, preached to the Gentiles with success the doctrine of Christ, the Apostle takes a journey through Syria. He then repairs to Cæsarea and Jerusalem (vv. 21, 22); afterwards traverses Galatia and Phrygia (ver. 23); and at length returns to Ephesus, where he had left Aquila and Priscilla (ver. 23), who accompany him into Syria (ver. 18). Meanwhile, at Ephesus, Apollos, having been fully instructed in the Christian doctrine by Aquila and Priscilla, had there preached the Gospel with singular zeal and success (ver. 25, seqq.).

² Ἰουδαῖον] Whether Aquila was then a Christian, has been by recent Commentators thought doubtful. It does not follow from the silence of St. Luke as to that matter, that he was not a Christian,—it being very usual for ancient writers to omit minute circumstances easily to be supplied, of which this may be one; espec. since the expression προσῆλθεν αὐτοῖς implies a sort of conversion, which was probably that of identity of religion; though it may imply only that of identity of occupation, the one producing the other. Be that as it may, there had been, from the earliest period of the Gospel, a congregation of Christians at Rome, which is supposed to have originated with some who had been present at the feast of Pentecost, when the Holy Ghost was imparted; and was doubtless increased by those Jewish Christians, who had occasion to repair to that city on commercial or other business.

—διατεταχέναι] 'had issued a διάταγμα, or decree.' Of this mention is supposed to be made in Suetonius, Claud. c. 23, in the words, 'Judeos, impulsore Chresto, assidue tumultuantes, Româ expulit.' The Christus there spoken of is by most recent Commentators supposed to have been a Hellenistic Jew; while the ancient and earlier modern ones are of opinion that it is only a false reading, or spelling, for Christus. And that Christus should be changed into Chrestus might easily happen, and did happen on other occasions.

The tumults there adverted to might well have been dissensions between the Jews and Christians (whether Jewish or Gentile), and other political disturbances; which so mighty a moral revolution, as the introduction of the Gospel, could not but produce. However, I agree with Neander, that, after all, no sure historical inference respecting the date of the event, or its connexion with any Christian Church at Rome, can be drawn.

3. σκηνοποιοί] Few terms so plain as this have given rise to more discussion as to the sense to be assigned to it. The general opinion of Commentators, both ancient and modern, is, that it signifies tent-makers. Some, however (as in the case of τίκτων, Matt. xiii. 55), perhaps thinking such an occupation too humble for the Apostle of the Gentiles, have fancied other senses,—namely, weavers of tapestry, makers of mathematical instruments, saddlers, &c. Yet for these significations of the word very slender authority exists; and it may be supposed that St. Luke, writing, as he does, in a plain style, would use such a term as this in its ordinary sense. There can be little doubt that the Apostle's trade was (according to ancient tradition) that of a maker of tents, formed of leather or hair-cloth, both for military and domestic purposes, especially in travelling; the latter sort being, from the scarcity of inns, much used throughout the East; and, in that warm climate, used, during the summer season, as houses.

— For ἔμεινε, 3 uncials, E, G, H, and about 12 cursive MSS., to which I add the Lamb. 1182, 1184, 1185, and 2 Mus. copies (together with Chrys. and Theophyl.) have ἔμεινε, which, though passed over by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., they might have received,—especially since the sense, not perceived by Expositors, seems to be, 'lodged with them.' So the Pesch. Syr. Translator took it; and also Chrys., as is plain from his words, which are, διὰ τοῦτο μένει, ὡς ἐπι-τήδειον ἐνὶ ὧν καταγάγειον. This signif. of the word often occurs in the New Test.; e. g. Luke xix. 5. John i. 39, 40. iv. 40. Acts ix. 43. xviii. 20, as also in Sept.

5. συνεῖχ. τῷ πνεύματι.] MSS. A, B, D, E, G, and 5 cursive (for Scholz's et alii cannot be reckoned), with the Syr. and some other Versions, have συν. τ. λόγῳ, which is adopted by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. I cannot, however, yet venture to receive the reading, except on stronger external authority, which I have not been able to find; though internal evidence is in its favour. If it be the genuine reading, τ. πν. may be regarded as an alteration of those who did not understand τῷ λόγῳ, which is, indeed, obscure enough to puzzle far better scholars than the early Biblical Critics; for instance, Canon Tate, while rendering it 'was strongly afflicted by their report,' at the same time avows that he is 'not prepared to say that the words will bear that sense.' The sense assigned to συν. τῷ πν. by Luther, Calvin, and Beza,—'he was under the impulse of ardent spiritual zeal,'—is very suitable to the context, but cannot be drawn from the words without violence. I confess that I am not satisfied with either reading; but I am disposed to think that τ. πνεύματι may have arisen from a marginal Scholium meant to develop the idea in συνεῖχ. As to τῷ λόγῳ, though obscure, it is not unintelligible, and therefore cannot be rejected as yielding no sense, or an absurd one. If it be received, the sense of συνεῖχ. τῷ λόγῳ may be this,—'he was earnestly engaged, hard pressed, busily occupied,' in the Word,—in teaching and preaching the word of the Gospel. Comp. 1 Tim. v. 17, ἐν λόγῳ, ἐν διδασκαλίᾳ. 1 Pet. iii. 1, ἀντι-θεοῖς τῷ λόγῳ. In fact, the greatest difficulty connected with the passage is in the συνέχετο, to remove which some ancient Critics—it is plain from the Vulg. instabat verbo—excoagulated the conjecture ἐνέκειτο, which, however, has never been found in any MS.; and even if found, would yield a sense of far less strength than συνεῖχετο, which is susceptible of the above sense; though I cannot find any example quite apposite, yet there is one nearly so in Luke xii. 50, where it is used of our Lord himself, ὡς συνέχομαι ἕως οὗ τελεσθῇ, 'how am I straitened by anxiety of spirit!' Lat. angustia. Comp. also Job xxxi. 23, Sept., φόβος Κυρίου συνέσχε με; and see my note on Thucyd. iii. 98, τῷ πόνῳ ('trouble of mind') ἐνεσχεόμενος, where I have shown that συνέχεσθαι is used of 'whatever hard presses, or distresses, the mind, enchains the spirit.' Comp. Æschyl. Prom., ονείρασι ἐνεσχεόμεν δόστηναι. It seems not unlikely that St. Luke might have the words of our Lord (recorded in his own Gospel) in his mind. Upon the whole, I have little doubt that τῷ λόγῳ is the true reading; that the Scholium τῷ πν. gradually pushed out τῷ λόγῳ, which then might seem unnecessary. However, whatever may have been the severe pressure under which Paul lay at this critical period for the Gospel, we may be sure that he the more sought aid in prayer from Him, on whom help is laid through the Spirit, and in that strength boldly persevered διαμαρτυρόμενος τὸν Ἰησ. Χρ., just as at xxvi. 22 he says, ἐπικουρίας τυχὼν παρὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ—ἵστηκα μαρτυρόμενος, &c.

6. ἀντιτασσ. δὲ αὐτῶν] 'arranging themselves against;' denoting a set opposition; properly a military term, but sometimes used figuratively, as here, and elsewhere. It rarely occurs in the Class. writers; but I find it in Thucyd.

iii. 83, τὸ δὲ ἀντιτετάχθαι ἀλλήλοις τῇ γυνάμει ἀπίστας ἐπὶ πολλὴ διήνεγκεν.

— ἐκτιναξάμενος τὰ ἱμάτια] A symbolical action (with which we may compare Nehem. v. 13), like 'shaking the dust off one's shoes' at any one, thereby signifying that we renounce all intercourse with him; see xiii. 51.

— τὸ αἷμα ὑμῶν ἐπὶ, &c.] Supply τρέψεται (which word is expressed in Aristoph. Nub. 39, ἐν τῇ κεφαλῇ πάντων τῶν σὺν τρέψεται) or τρέποιτο, as Aristoph. Ach. 833, ἐν κεφαλῇ τρέποιτ' ἰμοί. By αἷμα is here meant destruction, i. e. figuratively, 'perdition in the next world.' This manner of speaking was common to the Hebrews (see 2 Sam. i. 16. Ezek. xxxiii. 4), the Greeks, and the Romans. Several examples are adduced in Elsner and Wetst., who rightly derive it from the very ancient custom of putting hands on the heads of victims for sacrifice, and imprecating on them the evils which impended over the sacrificer, or the nation.

7. It appears probable, that,—as Expositors are generally agreed,—after this separation from the Jews, Paul went no longer to his lodging at the house of Aquila the Jew, and that μεταβάς denotes this change. Yet μεταβ. αὖ scarcely be taken of any thing but departure from the synagogue. The only way to remove the difficulty (however unnoticed by the Commentators) is to suppose a transposition of construction, μεταβάν being construed with ἦλθε, as if καὶ ἐκείθεν μεταβ. had been written. Nor is ἐκείθεν thus left without a Particip. to be referred, since that may be supplied from the subject matter, as supra xiii. 4, κατῆλθον εἰς Σίλ. ἐκείθεν τε (many ancient MSS. read καὶ ἐκείθεν), where a Particip. of 'going' has to be supplied. Comp. Mark ix. 30, ἐκείθεν ἐξελθόντες περιπαροῦντο. On συνομορ., see my Lex. The affair occasioned, as was likely, a schism among the Jews.

9. λάλει καὶ μὴ σιωπ.] There is here no pleonasm, but rather an intensity of sense is communicated by this blending of the two forms, —one, of simple command; the other, an injunction against the contrary.

10. λαὸς ἐστί] The persons in question are called Christ's people by anticipation; just as the Gentiles, who should afterwards embrace the Christian religion, are in John x. 16 already called the stock of Christ.

13. παρὰ τὸν νόμον—σέβ. τὸν Θεόν] Meaning 'to worship God in a manner contrary to the Law of Moses'; arguing, that the Mosaic worship was allowed to the Jews (as Jos. Antt. xiv. 40. xvi. 2, attests), yet this mode of worship was contrary to that Law, and therefore could not come under the privilege granted to it.

14. ἀδίκημά τι ἢ ῥαδιούργημα πονηρὸν] Of these two terms, the former is a general one, denoting 'a violation of law by transgression.' As to the latter, it denotes, not so much crime as (according to its original signification, —'a reckless course of action') 'that lighter offence against law, corresponding to our misdeemeanour.' See Lucian, Calumn. 920, and Plut. ix. 415. Here, however, it may seem to denote what we popularly characterize by 'roguey' (which comes from ῥαδιουργία), i. e. swagbery. In short, there seems an allusion to those mischievous tricks played off by the heathens, in ridicule of the Mosaic rites and ceremonies, espec. circumcision; —with reference to which the Jews were by the heathens contemptuously styled τερπί—see Juven. Sat. xiv. 96—106—such as that which Josephus tells us was committed by a Roman in ridicule of circumcision; and which were always severely punished, as a breach of law, when the

— κατὰ λόγον] 'according to reason,' 'fitly,' 'properly.' So Artemid. On. v. 77, ὁρῶναι καὶ κατὰ λόγον. 3 Macc. iii. 14.

— ἂν ἡνεσχόμεν ὑ.] Meaning, 'I should lend a patient ear to you; hearken to your request to have justice done you.' Of this sense of ἀνίχ. examples have been adduced from the Sept. and Jos., and from the Class. writers, few of them to the purpose.—The σὺν is omitted in A, B, D, E, and not a few cursives of the same family, with some ancient Versions, and cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch. 1, but restored in Tisch. 2; and retained by Alf., on the ground that 'its omission may be easily accounted for, but not its insertion;' very rightly. But the same applies to a multitude of other cases, where the Critics should have had the same wisdom to restore, or retain (as the case might be), and προσωπολήπτως κρινόντες, 'without respect of'—Μανυσερίπτις.

15. λόγου καὶ ὀνομ.] i. e. 'of doctrine and names [of the respective supporters, as of Moses and of Christ], and of the law which ye hold [as compared with another newly promulgated].'
 —ὄψεσθε. So Matt. xxvii. 4, σὺ ὄψει.

16. ἀπήλασεν αὐτοὺς ἀπὸ τοῦ β.] A form of expression (occurring also in Æschin. p. 4, 36, and 5, 26) which does not imply violent, or compulsory removal, but merely summary dismissal without a hearing. Comp. Xen. Cyrop. iii. 1, 4, τὰς γυναῖκας οὐκ ἀπήλασε, ἀλλ' εἰς ἀκούειν, 'allowed them to have a hearing.' See my note on Thucyd. vi. 56.

17. ἐπιλαβόμενοι δέ] Render: 'Whereupon, having seized,' &c. By πάντες are denoted the multitude (πληθὺς) present, namely, both Christians and Heathens; the latter of whom, as well as the former, were incensed at the bitter spirit evinced by the Jews, and were glad to take this opportunity of insulting them. The words οἱ Ἕλληνες are cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from A, B, and a few cursives (to which I add Lamb. 1181, m). Internal evidence is against the words, which I have bracketed. Sothenes, who seems to have been successor to Crispus as Ruler of the Synagogue, was thus harshly treated, as being, no doubt, the spokesman, and, perhaps, the promoter of the persecution. By ἔτυπτον is merely to be understood 'hitting him with their fists,' probably as he passed through the crowd out of the Hall of justice. So Thucyd. iv. 47, sub fin., ἀνδρας διήγον διὰ δυνὸν στοίχων ὀπλιτῶν—καὶ παιοῦνται καὶ κενττοῦνται ὑπὸ τῶν παρατεταγμένων. Any thing beyond that we cannot suppose they would venture on, or the Proconsul have permitted.

—οὐδὲν τούτων τῷ Γ. ἔμ.] 'none of these things was a matter of concern to Gallio;' 'he took no notice of these things;' not choosing to interfere in the religious disputes of the parties. Moreover, it was the prudential policy of the Roman governors to pass unnoticed any conduct which did not involve the honour or interest of Rome, that its yoke might be the lighter to the provincials.

18. κειράμενος τὴν κεφαλὴν] It has been disputed whether this should be referred to Paul, or to Aquila. The former view (adopted by many of the most eminent Commentators) is, for several reasons, stated at large by Neander and Alf., preferable,—and, besides having far more of probability, avoids many difficulties involved in the latter, ably as it is maintained by Grot., Kuin., and Meyer.—Ἐν Κεγχρεαῖς, 'at Cenchrea;' that being the port where he embarked on his voyage.

The best Commentators are agreed that the vow was not a Nazarite vow, but a votum civile, such as was, among the Jews, taken during, or after recovery from, sickness, or deliverance from any peril, or on obtaining any unexpected good, importing, 'to consecrate and offer up the hair,' the shaving of which signified the fulfilment of the vow. A custom this not unusual among the heathens also, as appears from Artemid. On. i. 28. Juvenal, Sat. xii. 8. Diphilus ap. Athen. p. 225, κόμην τρίφων ἱερὰν τοῦ Θεοῦ. Eurip. Bacch. 494, ἱερὸν ὁ πλόκαμος· τῷ Θεῷ δ' αὐτὸν τρίφω.

19. κατήντησε] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit κατήντησαν, from 3 uncial and some cursive MSS. (to which I add Trin. Coll. B. x. 16), confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. and other Versions; which may be the true reading; though it involves a no inconsiderable harshness of construction. In that case we should expect, not δέ, but τε. Thus it will be as if the plural were used, because ἐξέπλει καὶ σὺν αὐτῷ Πρίσκᾳ καὶ Ἀκύλᾳ [ἐξέπλει], at v. 18, may warrant it. Accordingly, it is better to retain κατήντησε. And, after all, κατήντησαν may have arisen from the circumstance of κατήντησιν having been originally written by a certain peculiarity often found in the oldest MSS. of all Greek writers; and so in the Lamb. and Mus. copies; and which thus became mistaken for κατήντησαν.

—κἀκείνους κατέλ. αὐτοῦ, &c.] The sense, obscurely expressed, is, that Paul had brought them with him, on his voyage to Caesarea, as far as Ephesus, and there put them on shore; the ship stopping there a short time, including a Sabbath-day, he took the opportunity of preaching to the Jews, to whom his discourse was so acceptable, that they pressed him to remain longer with them; which request, however, he was obliged to refuse, because, if he permitted the ship to go without him, he should probably not be able to meet with another to convey him in time for the feast at Jerusalem.

²² ἀναβάς.] Namely, to Jerusalem; for to this the word may very well be referred, from εἰς Ἱερουσόλυμα having occurred only a little before. It is true, that the words are omitted in some MSS., but, as I have shown, without sufficient reason. Besides, it must be to Jerusalem; for it would, as Alf. says, be absurd to suppose that Paul made the long detour by Caesarea only to go up into the town from the beach; and, as I observed in Recens. Synop., and also Alf., the expression κατέβη εἰς Ἀντ. would be improper, as used of a journey to Caesarea. Besides, to take it of Caesarea would exclude all mention of the going to Jerusalem (where alone the Feast could be kept), which was the main object of Paul's voyage from Corinth to Syria and Palestine. At Jerusalem Paul would, of course, fulfil his vow (which it was unnecessary to mention), but would, we may suppose, stay at Jerusalem no longer than during the Feast; after which he went down by sea; no doubt from Caesarea to Antioch: comp. xi. 27, κατὰθρον ἀπὸ Ἱερ. εἰς Ἀντ., which we may suppose to have been the almost invariable mode of passing to and from those cities.

²³ Here commences Paul's Third Apostolic Progress from Antioch, to visit and confirm the Churches in Galatia and Phrygia. There is, indeed, no expression to denote visiting; but it is implied in διερχ. καθεξῆς—ἰπιστ. Cappadocia, too, must here be included, though not mentioned, but plainly alluded to in the words διελθόντα τὰ ἀνωτερικὰ μέρη. Besides, Paul must have passed through a considerable part of Western Cappadocia in his way to Galatia. That Timothy, and, perhaps, Erastus, accompanied him, is certain; but of the others mentioned there is great doubt.

²⁵ κατηχημένος τὴν ὁδὸν τ. Κυρίου] meaning either that part of God's plan for the salvation of man by a REDEEMER that respects the doctrine of John the Baptist, which enjoined repentance and reformation, and the being baptized unto the faith of the future Messiah; or, rather, taking Κυρ. to denote Christ, the sense will be, 'the doctrine of the Messiahship of Jesus,' as announced by John the Baptist. Apollos, it seems, at first knew only the doctrine of John, who baptized εἰς τὸν ἐρχόμενον, preaching repentance, and announcing the coming of the Messiah (see Matt. iii. 2, compared with Acts xix. 4); while, by the more accurate instruction which Apollos received from Aquila and Priscilla, must be understood that of the Messiahship of Jesus, and the general historical facts concerning him; but of the consequences of that which he taught, as respects the doctrines of the Gospel,—especially regeneration, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost,—he had no knowledge. By the ἐπιστάμενος μόνον is, as Meyer remarks, 'not meant, that he was ignorant of the fact of there being such a thing as Christian Baptism; but that he was ignorant of its being any thing different from that of John: he recognized in baptism only that contained in the baptism of John as far as it was a sign of repentance; and of course was wholly in the dark as to regeneration and sanctification through the Spirit.'

²⁶ προσελ. αὐτόν] 'took him to their society.' See my Lex.

²⁷ συνιβάλετο—τοῖς πεπιστ. διὰ τῆς χάριτος] By συν.—π. is meant, 'contributed much to their spiritual help and edification.' Calvin ably opens out the full force of this expression, and, after some investigation, infers that they were aided in two ways:—(1) 'ut duces habentes peritum et exercitatum, superiores essent in conflictu; (2) deinde ut novā futurā stabiliretur eorum fides, ut esset extra vacillandi periculum.' As to the last words, διὰ τῆς χάριτος, the question as to their true reference is difficult, and scarcely determinable. They may be joined either with συνιβάλετο or with πεπιστ. The former view is adopted by most of the best Expositors down to Bengel, and, recently, by Meyer and Olshaus.; while others, as Hamm. and Piscator, with Alford, have adopted the latter. Alford argues against the former view, that 'the position is unnatural; he should have said 'less natural,' and 'that thus the sense would require τῇ χάριτι,'—a very inconclusive argument. I have hitherto adopted the former interpretation, by which the expression may be supposed to have reference to that especial 'grace of God ('gift of grace;' see 2 Cor. iv. 15. viii. 1. James iv. 6. 1 Pet. v. 5), by the extraordinary influences of the Holy Spirit, so likely to be communicated to one thus devoted to the great work of evangelization. And I see no reason to alter my opinion, which I find confirmed by the masterly exegesis of Calvin, where, after remarking that the words may be referred either to πεπιστ. or

to συνιβάλετο, he appends his own judgment on the point thus:—'Prior interpretatio nihil habet difficultatis: sensus enim erit, fideles illuminatos fuisse Dei gratia, ut crederent, ac si dixisset, fratres qui Dei beneficio jam ad fidem vocati sunt, in melius fuerint provecti. Videtur tamen alter contextus magis quadrare, quod Apollos gratiam, quā prædictus erat, cum fratribus communicando eos adjuverit. Ita "per gratiam" tantundem valebit, atque secundum mensuram gratie accepta.' Eph. iii. 8, ἰδοὺ ἡ χάρις αὐτῆς, ἐν τοῖς ἰθυσιν ἐπαγγελίσασθαι τὸ ἀνεξίτηλον πλοῦτον τοῦ Χριστοῦ. It was the non-difficulty of the latter interpretation which occasioned its adoption. But the other, though more difficult, has a more profound sense. The γάρ introducing the next verse has great force, with reference to συνιβάλετο in the sense which I have, after Calvin, assigned to it.

XIX. 1—40. Paul arrives at Ephesus, and proceeds to instruct the disciples of John there; certain occurrences during his residence narrated,—such as arose out of his exertions in the cause of the truth, issuing in the putting down of the Jewish exorcists:—whence the tumults fostered by the Jews, which arose among the Gentiles, and were with difficulty put down by the strong arm of the law.

1. διελθόντα τὰ ἀνωτερικὰ μέρη] These regions were, it is true, as I have before said, inland regions, as regarded the coast line of Ephesus; but, from the accounts of recent tourists, and the researches and investigations of Wieseler, as also of Con. and Howa., it would seem that there can be no reference to Galatia, or even to Phrygia; only the highland region at its N.W. being meant,—namely, that part of the table-land of the interior of Asia Minor, forming the frontier district of Phrygia and Asia,—namely, the mountainous ridge from which issue the upper waters of the rivers Hermus and Meander. As to the reading ἀνωτερικά, it may be a gloss, but not, as Alf. says, 'a good gloss,' as too indefinite. But it may have been an error of scribes, who were unacquainted with the rare word ἀνωτερικός.

— τινας μαθητάς] These persons were evidently in the way of salvation, as was Apollos at the time spoken of supra xviii. 25. They had been probably some time before baptized into John's baptism by some of John's disciples, but had not been long at Ephesus, when, by means of Aquila and Priscilla, and, perhaps, of Apollos, they had become convinced of the Messiahship of Jesus, and of the truth of his religion, though they had not been baptized into the faith, and, yet unacquainted with its doctrines, knew not of the descent of the Holy Spirit, much less had knowledge of his gifts.

2. αἰ Πνεῦμα ἅγιον ἐλάβετε] In the reply to this interrogation (of which the most faithful sense, though not the literal rendering, is, 'did ye receive the Holy Spirit when ye became believers?') the negative οὐκ is implied, engrafted on which is the form ἄλλ' οὐδὲ, imo ne quidem. This ellipsis of the οὐ after an interrogation where the person answering deems the answer unnecessary, or declines subjoining it through delicacy, is very rare, inasmuch that I know of no other example except one, — Alexis, in his Δευκ. Frag. i., 'Ἐρίστασαι τὸν σαῦρον ὡς δι' σκευάσαι; to which the answer is, ἄλλ' ἂν διδάσκει (for so I would point), 'No; but if you would teach me, I should know.' That the meaning meant to be conveyed by these words cannot be, what is presented by the E. V., 'we have not heard whether there be any Holy Ghost,' will sufficiently appear, when it is considered that these Ephesian disciples, having been baptized into John's baptism, must necessarily have received John's doctrine, that 'He who should have come after him, i. e. Christ, should baptize them with the Holy Ghost; and so could not be ignorant of the existence of the Holy Ghost. Upon the whole, the only admissible sense to be assigned to the words is, that 'they did not hear that the Holy Spirit had yet been given,' 'had had no mention made of the impartment of his gifts.'

3. εἰς τί—ἐβαπτίσθη.] A brief mode of expression, yet unconnected with ellipsis, denoting, as appears from the preceding context, 'Unto what profession of faith were ye baptized?' The reply, interpreted, as it must be, in accordance therewith, as connected with John's baptism, namely, repentance and reformation, with faith in the Messiah, of whom he was the Forerunner.

4. τουτέστιν εἰς τὸν Χ. Ἰ.] These are to be understood as the words of the Apostle, explaining what John taught, briefly importing, 'namely, on that Jesus, who is the Messiah.'

5. ἐβαπτίσθησαν, &c.] That the circumstance of these persons being rebaptized in the name of Jesus, affords no countenance to the notions of Anabaptists, has been shown at large in my Recens. Synop.; suffice it here to remark, that it is not Christian baptism that was repeated, inasmuch as John's baptism was not such.

6. ἐλάλουν τε γλώσσαις καὶ προεφ.] Notwithstanding the opinion of several recent commentators as to the import of these expressions, the sense must surely be, 'they spake with [foreign] tongues, and used their gift in the exercise of the προφητεία, or inspired teaching and preaching.' It is plain that γλώσσαις here is for ἑτέρας γλώσσας, as in the similar passage supra ii. 4, ἤρξαντο λαλεῖν ἑτέρας γλώσσας, καθὼς τὸ Πνεῦμα ἰδίδον αὐτοῖς ἀποφύγιγισθαι, where St. Luke gives the complete phrase, though afterwards he uses the elliptical form; as does St. Paul universally.

8. Lachm. and Tisch. cancel the τὰ before περὶ, from MSS. B, D, and 2 cursives, and some Versions; very insufficient authority, since internal evidence, in addition to the strongest external authority, is in favour of τὰ, which, while it might very well have been left out by scribes ignorant of the idiom, could not well have been put in. Alf. rightly retains it, but does not rightly represent it as 'put out because unnecessary.' As to the Versions, it was there passed over as unnecessary to the sense; a practice of perpetual occurrence; so that, in such a case, the authority of Versions is next to nothing.

9. ἐσκληρ. καὶ ἡπείθουν] Comp. Ecclus. xxx. 12, μήποτε σκληρυνθῆς ἀπειθήσῃ σοι. The few Expositors who notice the words, suppose an Hendiad., q. d. 'obstinately refused to yield credence; by which we get a truth, but not the truth. The Apostle meant to represent hardness of heart as the cause of their unbelief, as Calvin saw, who remarks, 'Certa hæc vis est cælestis doctrinæ, ut reprobus vel in furorē convertat, vel magis obstinatos reddat, non sua id quidem naturā, sed per accedens, ut loquuntur, quia dum urguntur a veritate, erumpit virus.

— ἐν τῇ σχολῇ Τυράννου τ.]. What sort of a school this was, Commentators are not agreed. Some suppose it to have been a kind of Beth-Midrash, or Divinity Hall, designed for reading theological lectures. Others think it was a philosophical lecture-room, and that Tyrannus was a rhetorician, or sophist. If the former conjecture be correct, he was probably a converted Jew; if the latter, a Gentile unconverted, but favourably disposed to Christianity.

10. πάντας] This may be taken, with many Commentators, in a qualified sense, for 'very many.' But, considering the constant influx of persons to this emporium and metropolis of Asia Minor, there could not be many individuals but had heard, at least by the report of others, of the doctrines of Christianity. So that there is no reason to regard the expression, with Alf., as 'hyperbolic', importing that all had the opportunity, and probably some availed themselves of it.

— Ἰουδαίους τε καὶ Ἕλληνας] Here Ἕλ. does not, as at supr. xi. 20. xiv. 1. xviii. 4, mean Gentile Proselytes; for, as Canon Tate observes, 'at this more advanced stage of Christian history it would seem to have acquired, naturally enough, the more extensive acceptation of Gentile converts, whether they had been, or not, Proselytes of the Gate before.'

11. οὐ τὰς τυχοῦσας] lit. 'such as were not of every day occurrence,' 'extraordinary.'

12. ἐπιφέρεισθαι] For this, MSS. A, B, E, and 16 cursives (to which I can only add 1 Lamb., 1182), have ἀποφύρ., which has been edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; but wrongly; since the text. rec. presents a more appropriate term; for the ἐπι in ἐπιφέρ. ought not (as it has been by many) to be considered as pleonastic, but as having the sense ad. Indeed, the word seems to have been a medical term, signifying adferre, to apply. Alford, indeed, pronounces ἐπιφ. to be a correction, to suit ἐπι τ. δὸθ. It might be so; but the vast preponderance of external evidence for ἀποφ. disproves the supposition. It is far more likely that ἀποφ. was a correction of the Alexandrine Critics, to suit ἀπὸ τοῦ χρωτὸς: and certainly a Class. writer would have used ἀποφ.—The case is different with the reading ἐκπορεύεσθαι for text. rec. ἔξερχ., adopted by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from A, B, D, E, and 20 cursives (to which I add 4 Lamb. and 2 Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16); and internal evidence is in its favour, from the great uncommonness of the term, which is no where else used of the going out of evil spirits; whereas ἔξερχ. is often used, but only by Luke. If it be asked, how came Luke to use ἐκρ. this once, and every where else (eight or nine times) ἔξερχ., I answer,—in order to suit the strong antithetic term ἀπαλλάσσεισθαι, which means, 'to be off and away, be gone from us'; as Xen. An. vii. 1, 4, ἐκίλευεν αὐτὸν ἀπαλλάσσεισθαι. Soph. Antig. 424, εἰπὼν ἀπαλλάχθητι, 'having spoken, be off'; and espec. Antig. 244, οὐκ οὖν ἀπαλλάχθαις ἀπαι; 'will you not then be off and be gone?' Accordingly, I have now received the word into my text.

13. τινες ἀπὸ τῶν περιερχ. 'I. i.] Render: 'certain persons of the Jews who go about as exorcists.' These (called by the Greeks ἐγύρται, and by the Romans circulatores) were a class of persons who, like our travelling quacks, or mountebanks, or conjurors, pretended to cure violent disorders beyond the skill of the physician, and even to cast out devils; and all this with the use of certain incantations or charms, made effective, partly by administering certain powerful medicines, and partly by strongly operating on the imagination. See Joseph. Ant. viii. 2, 6, and my note on Matt. xii. 27.

14. τινες] This may be construed with ἐπτά, 'some seven persons, sons of Sceva.' See infra xxiii. 23, and Thueyd. iii. 11. vii. 87. Or it may stand alone, and thus be pointed off.

— ἀρχιερέως] Not 'High Priest,' but 'a chief priest,' meaning a head of one of the 24 classes of priests mentioned at 1 Chron. xxiv., and adverted to at Matt. ii. 4, &c.; or chief of the Jewish priests resident at Ephesus.

'I recognize the authority of Jesus and Paul; but yours I disavow.' Comp. Imeus, σὺ δὲ τίς εἶ; οὐ γινώσκω σι. On the difference between ἐπίστ. and γινώσκω see note on Mark xiv. 68.

¹⁶. ἐβαλλόμενος] By a metaphor taken from wild beasts; of which see examples in my Lex.

—κατακυρ. αὐτῶν, ἵσχ. κατ' α.] Most Expositors are agreed in taking ἵσχυος κατ' αὐτῶν to denote 'exercised force over them, by maltreating them.' But the expression may be rather taken simply to mean, 'after overpowering them, held mastery over them.'

—ἵσχ. κατ' αὐτῶν] I know of no other example of ἵσχυος with κατὰ, which seems to be an idiom of the ordinary Greek. The Genit. οὐκ ἔστιν ἐν τῷ occurs in Soph. Aj. 502, ὅς μὲν ἵσχυος στρατοῦ. As respects the variety of reading here, the text. rec. seems, after all, the most genuine. The other reading, however plausible, arose, I suspect, chiefly from fastidious Critics, whose purpose it was to remove the tautology in αὐτῶν, though it is not properly such. Hence, doubtless, arose the ἀμφοτέρων for αὐτῶν, found in A, B, D, and 15 cursives; to which I can only add D, 1184; but of which there is not a trace in the Pesch. Syr. Vers. It evidently arose from correction.

παῖδες, &c. I add Plut. vi. 531, περιέργοις θρησκείαις καὶ ξίναϊς δαισιδαμονίαις ἀποκλείσθαι προσήκει τὴν αὐλίαν. The books here mentioned were, no doubt, treatises on magic and necromancy; such as those of Artemidorus and Astrampychus on the interpretation of dreams. Ephesus was the chief resort of the professors of the black art, who drew up what are called in the Class. writers the Ἐφέσια γράμματα; which were scrolls of parchment inscribed with certain formulæ, and bound to the body, being used as amulets.

—ἀργυρίου] What kind of silver coin is here meant,—whether silver shekels, or drachmas, is a debated question, since Ephesus was a Grecian city. The latter is the more probable opinion.

²⁰. κατὰ κράτος] for ἵσχυρως, 'exceedingly;' a Hellenistic idiom; the Class. writers only employing the expression in the place of ἵσχυρως, to signify vehementer.

²¹. ἔθετο ἐν τῷ πν.] 'resolved in his mind.' So the Hebrew בְּלִבּוֹ. Comp. Dan. i. 8. Hagg. ii. 19. 1 Cor. vii. 37.

—ναοὺς ἀργυροῦς] So Artemid. iv. 34, ἀργυρίων ναοὺ ἱερῶν. These ναοὶ ἀργυροῦ Ἀρτ. are, with most probability, supposed to have been small silver models of the Temple of Diana at Ephesus (one of the wonders of the world), or at least of the sanctum, or chapel,

τεχνίταις ἐργασίαν οὐκ ὀλίγην ²⁵ οὓς συναθροίσας, καὶ τοὺς περὶ τὰ τοιαῦτα ἐργάτας εἶπεν Ἄνδρες, ἐπίστασθε ὅτι ἐκ ταύτης τῆς ἐργασίας ἡ εὐπορία ἡμῶν ἐστὶν ²⁶ καὶ θεωρεῖτε καὶ ἀκούετε ὅτι οὐ μόνον Ἐφέσου, ἀλλὰ σχεδὸν πάσης τῆς Ἀσίας ὁ Παῦλος οὗτος πείσας μετέστησεν ἱκανὸν ὄχλον, λέγων ὅτι οὐκ εἰσὶ θεοὶ οἱ διὰ χειρῶν γινόμενοι. ²⁷ Οὐ μόνον δὲ τοῦτο κινδυνεύει ἡμῖν τὸ μέρος εἰς ἀπελεγμὸν ἐλθεῖν, ἀλλὰ καὶ τὸ τῆς μεγάλης θεᾶς Ἀρτέμιδος ἱερὸν εἰς οὐδὲν λογισθῆναι, μέλλειν δὲ καὶ καθαιρεῖσθαι τὴν μεγαλειότητα αὐτῆς, ἣν ὅλη ἡ Ἀσία καὶ ἡ οἰκουμένη σέβεται. ²⁸ Ἀκούσαντες δὲ, καὶ γινόμενοι πλήρεις θυμοῦ, ἔκραζον λέγοντες Μεγάλη ἡ Ἀρτεμις Ἐφεσίων!

which contained the famous statue of the goddess. These were much bought up, both for curiosity (as memorials of a building so matchless), and for purposes of devotion (as are the models of the Santa Croce at Loretto, in modern times), and were carried about by travellers, or others, like the moveable altars in use among the Roman Catholics; the model being always provided with a small image of the goddess, and carried about as a charm. Probably the ἀργυροκόποι also executed large medals representing the Temple, with the image of Diana,—of which some have been preserved.

—παρίχετο τοῖς τεχνίταις ἐργασίαν οὐκ ὀλ., &c.] ‘produced much gain to,’ as supra xvi. 16, ἥτις ἐργασίαν πολλὴν παρέχετο τοῖς, &c. By the τεχνίταις are here denoted the chief workmen; and by the ἐργάται, the inferior artisans, employed on the rougher work of these portable chapels.

—ἡ εὐπορία ἡμῶν] meaning, not ‘wealth,’ but simply ‘facultates,’ ‘substance.’ Comp. supra xi. 29, καθὼς ὑποοριτό τις, where see note. Render: ‘the means of subsistence which we have.’

—λέγων ὅτι οὐκ εἰσὶ θεοὶ οἱ διὰ χ. γιν.] The heathens (at least the ignorant multitude) regarded the images of the gods as the gods themselves. See Plut. de Isid. p. 379, τὰ ΧΑΛΚΑ—θεοὺς καλεῖν. Hence the makers of these were called θεοποιοί; and on the removal of the images, they supposed the gods themselves to be taken away. The better instructed, indeed, did not harbour so gross a fancy; yet they maintained that the gods in illis LATUISSE, and that hence they were θεοὶ, and filled with the presence of the Deity. They readily allowed that the gods did not need images; which, they said, were only invented in condescension to the weakness of men, and only meant as helps, to raise the soul to heaven, and as symbols and handmaids to religion. They regarded the images as representatives of the gods, and, as such, entitled to every honour. Finally, they maintained that they did not adore the images, but only the gods, who, as it were, resided in them. In short, they resorted to such arguments and excuses as those by which the idolatries of the Romish Church have ever been defended; but which were indignantly rejected by the great Christian Apologists, in their Answers to Celsus, Porphyry, and Julian; who would, doubtless, were they alive now, be as strenuous opposers of Romish, as they were once of Pagan idolatry.

²⁷ τοῦτο—τὸ μέρος] This is best considered as a brevity of expression, derived from ordinary usage, and meaning, ‘this very branch,’ or ‘department of business;’ and so in Latin pars.—As to ἡμῖν, it is not put for ἡμῶν, for it is a Datiuus incommodi; q. d. ‘to our injury.’ Ἀπειλεγμὸν, ‘utter disgrace;’ from ἀπελῆγ-χισθαι, ‘to be utterly refuted, or rejected.’ See my Lex. The construction is somewhat difficult: κινδυνεύει τὸ ἱερὸν—λογισθῆναι, τὴν τε μεγαλειότητα αὐτῆς μέλλειν καὶ καθαιρεῖσθαι. The difficulty, however, of the construction has occasioned some liberties on the part of Critics, and some blunders of scribes. To advert to the former;—MSS. A, B, E, and 15 cursives (to which I add Lamb. 1182, 1184) have τῆς μεγαλειότητος, which has been received into the text by Lachm. and Alf., but rejected by Matth. and Tisch.; rightly; since the external authority is very insufficient, coming chiefly from one family of MSS. in opposition to the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions. Nor is that disadvantage made up by internal evidence, which is quite against the reading, since it has evidently arisen from Critical correction, to introduce better Greek (for which reason the Greek Critic Toup embraced it), and a sort of oratorical flourish,—q. d. ‘that she should be deposed from her greatness,’—unsuitable to the speaker (a silversmith), and to the writer. According to the usual text the sense is, ‘Yea, that her majesty and glory (the magnificence of her temple and its worship) should be pulled down.’ Comp. similar expressions in Jos. Antt. vi. 9, 2, καθ. τὴν ἀλαζονείαν, and in the later Class. writers, as Diod. Sic. and Plut. The expression καθ. may seem inexact; but it was probably selected with allusion to the pulling down her Temple; which afterwards literally came to pass, so that of an edifice which was accounted one of the wonders of the world, not a fragment remains.

29. συγχύσει] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. prefix τῇς, from very many MSS. (I add all the Lamb. and Mus. copies): very properly; for it has every mark of genuineness, the sense being thus, 'the tumult that had arisen.'

31. Ἀσιαρχῶν] These Asiarchs were of the number of those annual magistrates, who, in the eastern part of the Roman empire, were (like the Roman Ædiles) superintendents of things pertaining to religious worship, the celebration of the public games, &c. They were called, according to the provincia over which they presided, Asiarchs, Lygiarchs, Bithyniarchs, Syriarchs, &c. The office was only for a year, and was elective; a certain number of persons (in Proconsular Asia, ten) being elected by the cities, and sent to form a common council at some principal city. Of these the Proconsul appointed one to act as the Asiarch; the rest being his colleagues, though also styled Asiarchs: for those who had borne the office were afterwards called Asiarchs by courtesy.

— μὴ δοῦναι ἑαυτὸν εἰς τὸ θέατρον] I cannot agree with Valcknaer and Kypke in regarding this as a forensic mode of expression, like εἰσελθεῖν εἰς τὸν δῆμον just before. For though they adduce examples of this use from Josephus, yet there εἰς κίνδυνον is added. It should rather seem to be a popular form of expression, denoting 'not to trust himself in the theatre.' So Cicero, c. Verr. iii. 19, 'Populo se ac coram daturum.' And though that is hardly sufficient warrant for the sense in question, yet it has some support from the ancient Versions; and thus there may be an allusion to the pure Greek phrase, διδόσθαι ἑαυτὸν εἰς κίνδυνον, which occurs in Demosth., Polyb., and Dionys. Hal. Since, however, this interpretation has the objection of involving a certain harshness, I now prefer to regard the expression as a later Greek, perhaps provincial Greek, idiom, to be taken in the sense which it bears in Diod. Sic. t. v. 39, διδόντες δὲ αὐτὸν εἰς τὰς ἐρημίας ἤλατό μονος. Jos. Ant. xv. 7, 7, εἰς τὰς ἐρημίας αὐτὸν δίδους, καὶ ταῦται—ἐνδομημονών. Ib. vii. 9, 7, ἐκτραπύντες τῇς ὁδοῦ εἰς κώμην τινὰ τῶν Ἱεροσολύμων οὐκ ἀπώθειν, ἑαυτοὺς ἰδωκαν. In all those passages, and probably in the present, the exact sense of the expression is, se confrens, betaking himself.

33. This verse involves no little obscurity, partly from certain words being used in a somewhat unusual acceptation; but chiefly from the construction being left incomplete, and the circumstances of the transaction in question having been rather left to be gathered from what is said, than distinctly narrated. Hence considerable difference of opinion exists both as to the construction and the sense. The construction commonly adopted is προεβίβασαν Ἀλέξανδρον ἐκ τοῦ ὄχλου which, though involving a somewhat harsh transposition, might be admitted, if the context would permit it. But it does not; for thus no tolerable account could be given of the transaction in question. It must therefore be taken before προεβίβασαν, and a Nominative supplied, — either τινὲς, as referred to ἐκ τοῦ ὄχλου, or the common ellipse ἄνθρωποι must be supposed at προεβίβασαν the sense of which term will depend upon the view taken of the affair then going forward; which has been not a little misunderstood by some Expositors, as Hamm. and Bp. Pearce. It should seem that certain well-disposed persons of the people present, with a view to quiet the tumult, were desirous to set up some one to address the multitude, and endeavour to appease their wrath, by showing that there were no just grounds for it. Now the Jews present were sure to join them, because they saw that the anger of the multitude was directed against both the Christians and themselves; and they were anxious that the speaker should at least take the blame off their shoulders, and lay it — where it ought, they thought, to be laid — on the Christians. They therefore put forward, as a proper person to speak, one Alexander, who, it seems, had a talent for haranguing; the same, probably, with 'Alexander the copper-smith,' mentioned in 2 Tim. iv. 14. Hence it appears that προεβ. cannot mean 'draw out,' or 'thrust forth;' for the word has never that sense, and here the context would not permit it: whereas προεβιάζω and ἀναβιάζω are very often used of setting any one up to speak, especially as an advocate for others; sometimes, however, only to express their sentiments. Examples in abundance are supplied by the Commentators and Steph. Thesaur. The above interpretation is supported by the authority of the Pesch. Syr. Version.

Προβαλόντων, just after, may be taken (as often), in a metaphorical sense, for 'proposing him,' recommending him [as a fit person]. These words προβαλόντων αὐτὸν τῶν Ἰουδαίων are added, to point out the prominent part taken by the Jews in the transaction; who, indeed, had some cause to feel alarmed for their safety, since their hostility to all idol-worship was well known; and the bitter animosity felt

towards them by the multitude is plain, from their refusing to hear the speaker because he was a Jew. Of ἀπολογεῖσθαι the sense is simply that of 'addressing the people in the way of justification,' to show them that no insult had been offered to the worship of Diana; or, at least, that the Jews were not the persons who had done the wrong.

— κατασείσας τὴν χεῖρα] lit. 'by waving his hand downwards,' thus signifying by signal, as it were, his wish to address them. In the same sense we have the term at xiii. 16, κατασείσας τῇ χειρὶ. The same construction is observable at xii. 17; though there what is denoted is simply the moving downwards of the hand by way of enjoining silence, as in Xen. Cyr. v. 4, 4. As it is used here, so is it in Philo, 556 and 1018. Jos. Antt. iv. 8, 48. viii. 11, 2. Polyb. i. 78, 3, and Heliod. Æth. x. 7. The full sense conveyed by the expression is, beckoned (and signalled) by waving downwards; and this idea is well represented by the passage quoted in Johns. Dict. from Addison: 'He beckoned to me, and, by the waving of his hand, directed me.' Hence may be emended a corrupt passage in Shakespeare, Coriol. Act iii. sc. 2: 'Thy knee bussing the stones (for in such business action is eloquence), waving thy head (which often 'wave') thus —' 'Volumnia is, indeed,' as Mr. Knight remarks, 'explaining her meaning (in saying that 'in such business action is eloquence') by her action. But that notion could not well be waving the head, but waving the hand; thereby soliciting a gracious hearing of what she had to say; thus (as the words a little further on express) 'asking their good loves.'

34. ἐπνιγνόντες] This (for the common reading ἐπινιγνόντων), found in many of the best MSS., has been adopted by almost every Editor; and rightly; for, besides the strong external evidence, internal is quite in its favour, it being the more difficult reading. It is, however, not so much a Nominative absolute, as it involves an anacoluthon.

35. καταστέλλω signifies properly 'to put down'; as Ps. lxxv. 7, καταστ. τὸ κύτος τῆς βαλάντης. But it is more frequently used in a metaphorical sense, of 'quieting a tumult.'

— γραμματεὺς] It is easier to ascertain the rank and duties of this office, than to represent the term by any corresponding one of modern languages. From the passages of ancient writers adduced by Wets., it appears that the Gr. was President of the Senate, and that his duties embraced most of those of our Chancellor, and Secretary of State. It may be conjectured that this functionary (of different dignity in different cities) was so called, from being the keeper of the archives, containing all the γράμματα of the State; as public treaties, decrees, and documents of every kind.

— τίς γάρ ἐστιν, &c.] Pearce and Markland observe that the γάρ has reference to some clause omitted, and to be filled up thus: '[There is no need of this clamorous repetition of 'Great is Diana'] for what man is there,' &c. Of this elliptical use of γάρ, very rare at the beginning of a speech, they adduce an example from Hdot. vi. 11, 'Ἐπὶ ξυροῦ γάρ ἀκμῆς ἔχεται ἡμῖν τὰ πράγματα, q. d. '[I am now induced to address you:] for our affairs are in the utmost danger.'

— νεωκόρον] The word at first denoted merely a sweepers of the temple. Afterwards, however, (when the humility of religious devotees made the office sought after even by persons of rank,) the term was employed to denote a curator, one whose office it was to see that the temple was kept clean and in good repair, and furnished with every thing proper for the celebration of public worship. (See Jos. Antt. i. 7, 6. Xen. An. v. 3, 6.) Sometimes, too, it meant, not curator, but simply cultor, worshipper; as in Joseph. Bell. v. 9, 5, οὗς (Israelites) ὁ Θεὸς ταυτῶ νεωκόρους ἦγεν. At length, what was properly applicable only to a person, came to be transferred, by Prosopopœia, to cities; especially as it was usual to personify them. And thus, by an accommodation of the sense, the term came to signify devoted, consecrated to; in which acceptance it was used not only of Ephesus, but also (as we find from inscriptions on coins) of other cities of Greece and Asia Minor. Nay, sometimes one and the same city was called νεωκόρος, with respect to three or even four different deities. So great was this devotion of the Ephesians to Diana, that we find from Ælian, Var. Hist. iii. 26, the city was styled her ἀνάθημα. And that it should have been thus attached to her service, we may easily imagine; since, by devoting itself to the goddess, the city was said to have been formerly saved from destruction, when about to be stormed by Cræsus. (See Hdot. i. 26.) The dedication in question, we learn, was accomplished by a very significant action,—namely, that of fastening the ends of cords to the walls and gates, and tying the other ends to the pillars of the temple; the very manner in which the Island of Rheneia was dedicated to Apollo by Polycrates. See Thucyd. iii. 94, and my note.—Θεᾶς before Ἀρτέμιδος (which is not found in several MSS. [add Lamb. 1182, 1184] and Versions) has been cancelled by Grieb., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.

— τοῦ Διοπετοῦς] Supply ἀγάλματος, which is expressed in the Syr. Version. It is not surprising that images of an antiquity so remote, as to ascend beyond all historical record, should have been feigned by the priests to have come 'from heaven.' And from heaven, in a certain sense, they might be said to have come, as far as regards the material; since aërolites (i. e. meteoric stones, or rather, metallic substances of stone-like appearance) of immense size, and most grotesque shapes, are known to have fallen from the skies. One or two of these might, in the infancy of society and the origin of idolatry (bearing, by a lusus naturæ, a rude resemblance to the human bust) have been regarded as images of gods,—and, as coming from the skies, sent from heaven to be worshipped. Afterwards similar aërolites, not naturally shaped like a bust, would be so formed by art. Of the latter kind were, I suspect, the far-famed Palladia of Troy and of Athens, both said to be διοπετιν. Sometimes, however, in a rude condition of society, the aërolite was left in its natural state, without any attempt to form it into a bust. Of this we have at least two instances; one in the famous black stone in the Kaaba at Mecca,—which, there is reason to think, has been an object of worship from the earliest ages;—the other, in an idol mentioned in Herodian, v. 3, and which he speaks of as existing in the Temple of the Sun at Baalbec,—namely, a sort of image not χειροποίητον, but ἀνύραστον, of black stone, and of a conical figure, bearing in form a resemblance to the sun, and said to be διοπετιν.

—ἱεροσύλους] Not robbers, but, fig., sacriligious persons, who rob the goddess of her just rights and honours; as the words following more clearly express.

—θεόν] This, for the common reading θεόν, is found in many MSS. (including almost all the Lamb. and some Mus. MSS., and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16), nearly all the early Editions. and some Fathers, and has been preferred by Mill, and adopted by Matthæi, Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. It is also confirmed by internal testimony; since the scribes were far more likely to change θεόν into θεῶν, than the contrary, as appears from this,—that some who had θεόν in their originals changed τὴν into τόν, which Griesb., by an unaccountable blunder, received into the text.

³⁸. λόγον] scil. μομφῆς, a complaint. See my Lex.

VOL. I.

—ἀγόραιοι ἀγονται] sub. ἡμέραι. Render: 'there are court-days held for hearing causes.' So Strabo, cited by Wetstein, τὰς ἀγοραίους ποιοῦνται καὶ τὰς δικαιοδοσίας.

—ἀνύπατοι] The only satisfactory way of accounting for the plural here is to regard it not so much as an hyperbole, as a popular idiom, by which the plural is put for the singular, in a generic sense, 'there are such persons, as Proconsuls;' q. d. 'It is for Proconsuls to decide such matters.' So Demosth. de Coron. p. 15, νόμοι εἰσὶν, and Seneca, Controv. iii. 8, 'Quid cœtu (tumultu) opus est? Sunt scriptæ ad vindictam injuriarum omnium leges.'

—ἐγκαλείψαν ἀλλήλους] for ἐγκλησιν or ἐγκλήματα ἀλογίστως, 'let them implead one another.'

³⁹. ἐτέρων] meaning, 'other matters of public concern,' whether political or religious. Such, at least, is the sense, if ἐτέρων be the true reading. Some MSS., however, as B and 15 curives (to which I add Lamb. 1185), have παραίτερον, which seems to have been read by the Pesch. Syr. and Arabic Translators. It is also found in the very ancient Italic, and was probably read by the Vulgate Translator (for the alterius of that Version seems to be nothing more than an error of the scribes for alterius); and it has been edited by Lachm.; while Tisch. and Alf. are agreed, with me, in retaining the text. rec. The latter, in saying that παραίτερον is a 'mistake from Itacism,' has been misled by my error. I ought to have said, that, although it might, under ordinary circumstances, have arisen from Itacism, yet here it evidently arose from the correction of Critics, who stumbled at the obscure homeliness of the expression, and altered it to what a pure Greek Class. writer would have written. Thus παραίτερον would be used for πρὸς τοῦ δόντος, occurring in Plato, p. 484, and Æschin. ap. Steph. Thes.; or τοῦ προσήκοντος, as in Demosth., p. 1182. See my note on Thucyd. iii. 81, 4. The elliptical form, however, is so rare, that I know of only one example elsewhere,—Soph. Trach. 663, μὴ παραίτερον πεπραγμέν' ᾧ μοι.

—By τῇ ἐννόμῳ ἐκκλησίᾳ is to be understood (at least according to the sense which has been universally assigned to the expression) 'an assembly called in a lawful manner, and at a legally fixed time,' by the magistrate. Yet, in so explaining, we encounter a serious difficulty in the presence of the Article τῇ, which thus may be said to be worse than useless. Nor is this difficulty removed by adopting the view of the sense formerly proposed by myself in Recens. Synop. (subsequently adopted, without any acknowledgment, by Mr. Rose on Parkhurst's Lexicon),—namely, 'the regular (E. V. marg. ordinary) assembly;' i. e. 'one of the usual assemblies; for this lies open to the objection of being at variance with the force of the Article. The only effectual mode of overcoming the difficulty is to suppose, that by τῇ ἑννομῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ is meant, what would have been more plainly expressed by τῇ κυρίᾳ ἐκκλησίᾳ,—namely, 'the first and principal of the four ἐκκλησίαι, which were regularly held in each πρυτανεία, or month of thirty-five days; as we learn from Aristot. ap. Harpocr. in v. κυρία ἐκκλησία, and especially from Pollux, viii. 95, whose words are τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν ἡ μὲν κυρία, ἐν ᾗ τὰς ἀρχαὶ ἐπιχειροτονοῦσιν, &c., and where, among other principal matters on that day attended to, he specifies καὶ τὰς ἀγγελίας ὁ βουλόμενος, εἰσαγγίλλει, meaning by τὰς ἀγγελίας εἰσαγγ., impeachments for some public offence, civil or religious; on which subject see Schœmann's Comitia, and Attic Process. In like manner, then, we may suppose the meaning of what the Γραμματεὺς said, to have been, that 'if they sought to make complaint of other matters' (the alleged offence against the state religion, in the insult to the goddess Diana), there must be a public impeachment of the offenders at what is termed ἡ ἑννομος ἐκκλησία, a popular rather than correct expression for ἡ κυρία ἐκκλησία, though, if I mistake not, one not without parallel elsewhere, i. e. in Charit. i. 1, where the Edd. and MSS. have ἐνιστ * νόμιμος ἐκκλησία. Now there, for the words as they now stand (two letters having been eaten away in the only MS. extant), I doubt not was formerly written ἐνιστῇ ἡ νόμιμος ἐκκλησία (νόμιμος being used as later Gr. for ἑννομος), and I would read the verb, not, as it is done by D'Orville, erat, but constituēbatur; for ἐνιστῇ, though a term properly used of a suit at law, yet bore also the general sense, as applied to an assembly, was being held.

—ἐπιλυθῆσεται] scil. τὰ πράγματα, to be supplied from the foregoing context. The meaning is, 'the matters in question shall be settled,—despatched, in the legal assembly.' This is supported by the rendering of the Vulg. alioquin, and the Pesch. Syr. dirimi. It appears, then, that ἐπιλύω is here used where διαλύω would have been more agreeable to strict propriety; and the latter verb is often used to denote transacting or despatching business, or settling any matter. So Demosth., p. 526, ταῦτὸ τοῦτο ἰδίᾳ διαλυσάμενος, 'having despatched and settled that same matter.'

40. κινδυνεύομεν] The first person is delicately used for the second, per κοινωσίαν. Στάσις, in the law sense, denoted not only sedition, but tumult, and is further explained by συστροφῆς following, which signifies 'a tumultuous assemblage,' ἐξστασις, as an Attic Greek writer would have said; though Herodotus, vii. 9, init. has κοίην πλήθεος συστροφῆν. But the use of the word is almost confined to the phrase κατὰ συστροφῆν, or συστροφῆς εἶναι, or συνίνααι.

XX. 1—XXI. 16. Paul passes from Ephesus into Macedonia, and thence into Greece, after which he goes by sea to Jerusalem. Some notices of the first journey occur in 2 Cor. ii. 12, 13; see Con. and How.

3. At ποιήσας there is, as often (as supra xix. 34), an anacoluthon; and in the next words, ἐπιβουλῇ, as being a verbal, takes the construction of its cognate verb. The plot was probably one to assassinate the Apostle either while going on board, or on the voyage. In τοῦ ὑποστ. there is a Genit. of 'purpose' = εἰς τὸ ὑπο.—ἐγένετο γνώμη, sc. αὐτῷ, 'it was his purpose,' or 'resolve.' Comp. Thucyd. i. 62, 3, ἦν δὲ ἡ γνώμη τοῦ Ἀρ. ἐπιτηδεῖν, &c., 'a construction,' says Güllér, 'τὸ ἰδοῦν.'

5. οὗτοι] It is not clear whether by οὗτοι are to be understood all the foregoing persons, or only the two last; but probably the former.

6. μετὰ τὰς ἡμ. τῶν ἀζ.] 'after Passover time; for the Jews spoke of their festivals in the same way as we do, when we say Christmas-time, or Michaelmas-time. Ἀχρὶς ἡμερῶν π., lit. 'up to,' as far as, 'in five days; a peculiar, perhaps Hellenistic, idiom; but here used to intimate the length of the passage, as compared with their former one the contrary way (supra xv. 11), which had been made in two days. The wind, doubtless, was contrary;

but, from the state of the currents, &c., the passage from Troas to Philippi was probably always a shorter one than the other.

7. μιᾷ τῶν σαββ.] See note on Matt. xxviii. 1, 'We have here,' as Mr. Alf. observes, 'an intimation of the continuance of the practice, which had begun immediately after the Resurrection (John xx. 26), of assembling on the first day of the week for religious purposes:' though I agree with him that we do not find in the Christian Scriptures any trace of a Sabbatical observance of the Lord's day. As to the notion of 'the transference of the Jewish Sabbath from the seventh day to the first, that was,' as he observes, 'an invention of later times.'—To pass from things to words;—for τῶν σαβ. MSS. A, B, D, E, and 20 cursives (to which I add Lamb. 1182, 1183, 1184), and some Versions, have ἡμῶν, which has been received by Griesb., Scholz., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; and internal evidence is quite in its favour. It is probably, but not certainly, the true reading. As to the τοῦ before κλάσαι, which all the Editors, from Matthæi downwards, concur in cancelling, it is doubtless not genuine; and I find it absent from all the Lamb. and Mus. copies, and from Trin. Coll. B, x. 16. It came, however, I suspect, from the margin, or from Critics who brought it in from supra 3, τοῦ ὑποστρέφειν.

8. Ἦσαν δὲ λαμπ. ἱκ., &c.] Why this circumstance should be mentioned is not obvious. It could not be, as Alf. thinks, 'because many lights are apt to increase the drowsiness,' or, as others, to intimate that it was a place of public worship. Whatever may have been the reason, this is evidently one of those minute accidental circumstances in the narrative, which mark an eye-witness. I have pointed out several such in Mark's Gospel, and also in John's. Suffice it to advert to John vi. 10, ἦν δὲ χορτὸς πολλὸς ἐν τῷ τόπῳ, where see my note. And, as there the 'much grass' is adverted in allusion to the convenience of the place for the purpose, so here, I apprehend, the circumstance of the 'many lights' was thrown in to point at the distinctness with which the full headlong of the youth was seen by those who sat (as it seems did Luke) in a situation to have a full view. Thus there is a touch of the graphic.—To advert to a matter of verbal Criticism;—for text. rec. Ἦσαν, MSS. A, B, D, E, G, H, and at least 50 cursives (though vastly undergathered through the shameful carelessness of Griesb. and Scholz.); to which I can add all the Lamb. and some Mus. copies; have ἤμεν, which is confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. and other ancient Versions, and also by internal evidence; since, as Canon Tate observes, Cont. Hist. p. 136, the text. rec. Ἦσαν (a Critical alteration, to suit αὐτοῖς preceding) interrupts the personal continuity of the narrative, which the genuine ἤμεν preserves. Besides, ἤμεν is more suitable to the personal eye-witness, who is recording a minute circumstance.

9. καθήμενος] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. adopt καθίζόμενος, from 4 uncial and a few cursive MSS., and those only of the same family, and I can only add Lamb. 1182. Now, considering the slenderness of external evidence, at least in cursives, and the quarter from whence the reading comes, I doubt not that it was a correction of style by the Alexandrian Critics, who thought it would better suit the subsequent καταφερόμενος. However, since Luke once elsewhere uses καθεῖς, namely, supra vi. 15, where the MS. D, and a few ancient cursives have καθήμενος, it is very possible that καθεῖς may be the true reading here.

— τῆς θυρίδος] Render: 'the window;' seemingly the only one in the room; which, it seems, was a kind of lattice, or casement, to let in light, admitting of being thrown back, so as to admit air into the apartment, heated by so much company and so many lamps; see Arundel in the 2nd vol. of his 'Discoveries in Asia Minor.' Καταφερόμενος ὕπνῳ, for εἰς or πρὸς ὕπνον, of which latter construction examples are adduced by the Commentators. The former is Hellenistic; thus it occurs in Symmachus' Version of Pa. lxxvi. 7. Most Commentators closely connect καταφ. with ἔπειτα, taking it to mean only ἔπειτα κάτω. But the latter may denote the completion of the action described as in progress at καταφ.

— τοῦ τριστέγου] 'the third story;' for στῆγος signifies not only a roof, but the flooring of an upper apartment, as being a roof to the apartment below. So the Latin tridegna tecta, for 'the third floor.' Artem. iv. 46, has τριστίγην.

— ἤρθη νεκρός] Many recent Commentators suppose the expression to mean 'was taken up for dead.' They urge that persons falling from a high place are often found in a swoon, and that there is nothing in the context that would lead us to think the lad was dead. Nay, that Paul himself says, 'he is not dead.' The first argument, however, has no force as opposed to the plain words of St. Luke. And the second and third have next to none. There is no trait in the Apostles and Evangelists more remarkable, than their avoiding every thing like setting off any circumstance to the utmost. Further, it by no means follows, as they maintain, from St. Paul's stretching himself upon, and embracing, the young man, that he thought him alive, or meant to see whether he was so or not; for the action did not tend to such a purpose. The Apostle, by doing the very thing which Elijah and Elisha in similar circumstances did (see 1 Kings xvii. 21. 2 Kings iv. 34), evidently regarded him as dead; and, no doubt, followed the example of the Prophet, in offering up fervent prayers that he might be brought to life. And as to the expression of St. Paul, ἡ γὰρ ψυχὴ αὐτοῦ—ἐστίν, we are no more to infer from that, that the young man was not dead, than, in the narration at Matt. ix. 24, from the words οὐ γὰρ ἀπέθνε, that the damsel was not dead; see the note there. In short, it was plainly Luke's intention to record a miracle of raising the dead; in doing which he thought fit to state the significant action accompanying the miracle, in order to advert to the similarity of the case to that of Elijah.

10. συμπεριλαβὼν] A rare word, seldom occurring in the Class. writers, and never in the present sense, that being confined to περιλ. Accordingly, the difference is in the addition of συν, which is not pleonastic, nor does it signify, as Robins., Lex., supposes, 'withal,' but simply denotes the completeness of the action (as in συμπαρῶν, συγκαλύπτω, and many other verbs), and is usually intensive, though it carries with it somewhat of the graphic. The only other example I can find of its use in this sense is, in Epiphani., t. i. p. 981, τοὺς χρηστοὺς τῶ ὁμοίᾳ μίσει συμπεριλαμβάνοντες.

11. κλάσας ἄρτον καὶ γευσάμενος] Some difference of opinion here exists as to whether this is to be understood of the Eucharist, or of a common meal. The older Expositors adopt the former view; the latter ones, from Grot. downwards, in general, the latter; and with reason. For, 1. The expression κλᾶν ἄρτον is only used of the Apostle; 2. Wherever that phrase is used of the Eucharist, it is used simply, never with the addition of καὶ γευσάμενος: especially since the term γεύσασθαι did not imply eating little, but merely denoted taking food, whether little or much; 3. The following term ὀμλήσας suggests the idea of a common meal, since wherever it occurs in Scripture it is used of ordinary conversation, not of preaching, as in the Ecclesiastical writers; for which διαλέγεσθαι is used, as just before. Not to mention, that as the Apostle had already so much exceeded the usual time in his discourse, he would hardly, at that unreasonable hour of the night, resume, and continue it 'a good while, till day-break;' nor would he then celebrate the Eucharist, which had, probably, been administered at an early period of the meeting. Before ἄρτον, Iachm., Tisch., and Alf. receive τὸν, from A, B, C, D, and 2 cursives; to which I can add nothing; and internal evidence is equally balanced. For though it might, as Alf. says, be omitted through the force of the Article being overlooked, yet it might be inserted by the Critics, to bring in the sense required by the context; though at the similar passage, supra ii. 46, it is not expressed. If genuine, it will mean, 'the bread set on the table.' See note on Matt. xxvi. 26; and comp. Luke xxiv. 30. λαβὼν τὸν ἄρτον, and v. 35, ἐν τῇ κλίσσει τοῦ ἄρτου.

13. προελθόντες ἐπὶ τὸ πλοῖον] No ship has been recently spoken of; but at ver. 6 mention was made of one sailing from Philippi. Therefore Bp. Middl., with reason, supposes this to be the ship there meant; in which, it seems, Luke and his party made their coasting voyage from Philippi, touching at Troas and other places by the way, till they reached Patara, where they embarked in another ship bound to Phœnicia. The stay of seven days, made by Paul and his companions, at Troas may be accounted for by supposing that the ship had been staying that time for the discharge of commercial business. It should seem that Paul and his companions depended for their passage on such coasting vessels, employed in the carrying trade, as they should meet with, and which would be likely to most forward them on their way to Jerusalem; embracing, at the same time, every opportunity (afforded by the occasional stoppage of those vessels for the purposes of trade) to salute and instruct their Christian brethren by the way. Hence we may account for (what has been thought strange) the Apostle's not calling at Antioch in his way; namely, because the vessel, in which he had taken his passage, did not, it seems, touch there.

— μάλλιν αὐ. πεζεύειν] On the reason for Paul's taking this course Commentators variously speculate; see Recens. Synop. It was, I apprehend, in a great measure to avoid the tedious and, considering the want of skill in the ancient navigators, sometimes dangerous circumnavigation of the promontory of Lectum, which runs out a long way into the sea; inasmuch that the distance from Troas to Assos is about one-third shorter by land than by sea. Now the Apostle's perils by sea had been so great, that he might well prefer going by land; especially when the distance was so much shorter. I say, going by land; for I doubt not that such is the meaning of πεζεύειν here (not 'going on foot,' as nearly all the Commentators render), as very frequently in good writers, such as Xen., Aristot., Isocr., and Strabo, from πεζῇ, 'by land,' as often in Hdot. and Thucyd. So Hdot. vii. 110, π. ἱππεύσαι.

16. For ἦν, 5 uncial, and 10 cursive MSS., with Lamb. 1182, have εἴη, which has been adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; but injudiciously; since the latter has every appearance of being a mere emendation of style proceeding from the Alexandrine Critics, because the Opt. is more Classical Greek. For ἔκρινε, just before, MSS. A, B, C, D, E, and about 10 cursives (with Lamb. 1182), and all the ancient Versions except the Sahid., have κερρίκει, which is adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. and may be the true reading; but, from the insufficiency of evidence in cursive MSS., it seems to be rather an alteration of Critics, who saw that a Pluperf. is required by the preceding context; as also did the ancient Translators, who rendered freely. The Critics were not aware of similar instances of inexactness in the use of the tenses, by which the Imperf. is employed where strict propriety would require the Pluperf. See Luke xix. 15. John iv. i. xi. 30. Acts i. 2, and many others; especially in a narrative, where a past occurrence is introduced after the proper order of time, as in Matt. xiv. 3. John xviii. 24, et al., which is the very case here, for Paul's determination to pass by, go past Ephesus, was previously made, probably at Mitylene. Such being the case, we do not (as Alf. imagines) see here that the ship was at Paul's disposal, and hired at Philippi for the voyage to Patara. It is highly improbable that Paul would be able to afford so heavy an expense. I am quite of the opinion of Conyb. and Hows., that if Paul had had the command of the movements of the vessel by having hired it, he would never have passed by, unvisited, his recent converts, a goodly company gathered out of the mass of unbelievers by the labours of three years; in short, he would have landed at Ephesus rather than at Miletus,—since the same wind, which carried him to the latter harbour, would have been equally favourable for a passage to the former. St. Paul's intention was, as Luke says, to be, if possible, at Jerusalem at the Pentecost. But, as Conyb. and Hows. truly observe, 'even with a ship at his command, he could not calculate on favourable weather, if he lost his present opportunity; nor could he safely leave the ship which had conveyed him hitherto; for he was well aware that he could not be certain of meeting with another that would forward his progress. He determined, therefore, to proceed in the same vessel, on her southward course from Trogyllium to Miletus.'

17. ἀπὸ δὲ τῆς Μιλ. πέμψ.—μετεκαλ.] The distance is not, as Alf. says, 'about 50 miles,' but 35; nay, Conyb. and Hows. reckon it 30, and show that the presbyters of Ephesus might easily reach Miletus on the day after the summons was received.

— τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους] As these persons are at ver. 28 called ἐπισκόπους, and especially from a comparison of other passages (as 1 Tim. iii. 1), the best Commentators, ancient and modern, have with reason inferred that the terms πρεσβ. and ἐπισκ. as yet denoted the same office. Ἐπίσκοπος might denote either an overlooker or a care-taker; and these senses would be very suitable to express the pastoral duties. Πρεσβύτεροι were by office overlookers, and in that sense ἐπίσκοποι. But the term might also (correspondently to the Hebr. רִּבֵּן) denote a ruler,—an idea naturally arising out of the former. And since it must, at an early period, have been found necessary that there should be a superintending authority, not only in private individuals, but in the Church itself, as to the various bodies thereof forming the congregations as its members—for no society can exist without subordination—hence we may suppose, that one of the presbyters was, in such a case, invested with authority over the others, and consequently was a Bishop in the modern sense of the term. And since, after the exercise of Episcopacy, in that sense, was established, it became proper to have a name by which to designate the ruling Presbyter, none seemed so proper as ἐπίσκοπος, because it was far better fitted to denote the Superintending than the Pastoral duties; while πρεσβ. had, no doubt, been always more in use to denote the Pastoral.

18. ὡς παραγίνεσθαι πρὸς αὐτόν] 'when they had advanced to him.' So Luke vii. 9. viii. 20, εἰπαν αὐτοῖς Ὑμῖν ἐπίστασθαι. This speech of Paul is worthy both of admiration, as a holy apostolic address, and of great attention, as being purely Pauline in character, and even in phraseology, as is clear from the many parallel sentiments and kindred idioms found scattered up and down in his Epistles. The MS. D has ἀδελφοί after, and one other MS. and the Sahid. Vers. before, ἐπίστ., which Conyb. and Hows. adopt,—'because,' say they, 'it is certain that Paul would not have begun his address abruptly without some such word.' So, too, thought the Critics who inserted the word; for that it is an interpolation is evident from the testimony of all the MSS. except two, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. and other Versions, except the Sahidic, and by internal evidence, as the Editors are agreed. There might have been more of courtesy in the ἀδελφοί, but the force and gravity of the appeal, introduced by the ὑμεῖς emphatic, may dispense with it.

— πῶς μ. ὁ. ἐγενόμην] 'How I have conducted myself and acted among you.' Comp. 1 Thess. i. 5. ii. 10.

19. δουλεύων—ταπεινοφ.] 'discharging the ministry of the Lord (as to his apostleship) with all humility and modesty.' The μετὰ must be repeated at δακρύων, and rendered, with a slight accommodation of sense, amidst, or amongst.

20. οὐδὲν ὑπεστειλάμην] 'I have kept back, suppressed nothing.' On the proper force of ὑπεστειλλέσθαι, and how it is derived, see my Lex. Its Deposuit use (as here) with Accus. of thing, of 'concealing any thing,' is not simply Hellenistic, since it occurs in the purest Attic writers, as Plato, Apol., where we have ὑποστ. τι used in conjunction with ἀποκρύψασθαι. Eurip. Or. 607, ὑποστ. λόγον, and especially as used with οὐδὲν or μηδὲν, Isocr., p. 167 and 196. Demosth., p. 64. It is found also in Jos. Antt. vi. 5. 8. Bell. i. 20.

22. δεδεμένος τῷ πνεύμ.] Many Commentators, and recently De Wette, take πνεῦμα to mean the Holy Spirit. But thus δεδεμένος admits of no satisfactory sense, and the next clause — τὰ ἐν—μὴ εἰδώς—discountenances this interpretation. Render: 'bound in the spirit;' and we may comp. συνέχεσθαι τῷ λόγῳ, xviii. 5,—but with this difference, that, as appears from the next verse, τὸ Πνεῦμα ἅγιον, &c., we must consider Paul's spirit as strongly actuated by the influence of the Holy Spirit. So in other passages the Holy Spirit of God is stated to have not only swayed his mind, but guided his apostolic course.

23. πλὴν ὅτι.] Supply ἐν and τοῦτο, and repeat εἰδώς. 'But this one thing [alone I know] that.' Comp. Soph. El. 426, πλείω δὲ τούτων οὐ κάτοισα· πλὴν ὅτι πέμπει μοι, &c. The ἐν is expressed in Aristoph. Pac. 227. Τὸ Πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον is taken by the best Commentators to denote persons endued by the Holy Spirit; the sense, they say, being 'that the Holy Spirit in every city testified by the mouth of inspired prophets;' see xxi. 4, 11. And the κατὰ πόλιν confirms this view. But the direct and personal declaration, by forewarning, of the Spirit, must not be excluded. Two examples of this warning of the Spirit occurred, at Tyre, xxi. 4, and at Caesarea, xxi. 10, 11.

24. There is here a strange variety of reading, arising from the carelessness of the scribes. Tisch. and Alf. edit ἄλλ' οὐδὲν λόγον ποιούμεαι τὴν ψυχὴν τιμίαν ἑαυτῶ, from MSS. B, C, D^a, and the Syr., Sahid., Æth., Arm., and Arab. Versions. This reading Alf. regards as 'the one from which all the others have arisen;' and he remarks, that in the first clause there is a combination of two constructions, οὐδὲν λόγον ποιούμεαι τὴν ψυχ. ἑμ. and οὐ ποιούμεαι τὴν ψυχὴν τιμίαν ἑαυτῶ, q. d. 'I hold my life of no account;' and he adds that the sense of the whole verse is, 'But I hold my life of no account, nor is it so precious to me as the finishing of my course.' That this is a suitable sense I mean not to deny; and were the authority for the reading sufficiently strong, I should be induced to receive it. But the testimony of all the copies but three (including all the Lamb. and Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16) forbids any change of text. Nor can internal evidence, properly weighed, be said to call for it; for though the reading might well be admitted, if it occurred in one of the orations of Thucyd., surely this short-cut, and dense brevity, is quite foreign to the style of the Sacred writer. Accordingly the reading is rejected by Matth., Griesb., Scholz, and Lachm. If it be asked, how I account for the existence of the reading adopted by Tisch. and Alf., except on the presumption that it is the genuine one, I answer, that it arose from the strongly confused state of the text in the various MSS., in which it seemed to the Critics, as very often elsewhere, that more words were used than were necessary, and that the sense might be neatly wrapt up in the condensed form they offered. As a proof and illustration of this, I would point to the reading of A, D^a, and a few cursives, to which I add Lamb. 1182 (a most ancient text), οὐδὲν λόγον ἔχω, οὐδὲ ποιούμεαι τὴν ψυχὴν τιμίαν ἑαυτῶ. This evidently is only a Critical emendation of the text. rec., and therefore ought not to have been adopted by Lachm. As to Versions adduced to confirm the slender testimony of the 3 MSS., the only one of any weight or authority is the Pesch. Syr., which has no such reading, but another short-cut reading, thus:—Sed mihi nihili aestimatur anima mea ut complcam cursum οὐδενὸς λόγον ποιούμεαι, οὐδὲ ἔχω τὴν ψυχὴν μου τιμίαν ἐμαντῶ, ὡς τελειῶσαι τὸν δρόμον μου μετὰ χαρᾶς, καὶ τὴν διακονίαν ἣν ἔλαβον παρὰ τοῦ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ, διαμαρτύρασθαι τὸ εὐαγγελίον τῆς χάριτος τοῦ Θεοῦ. ²⁵ Καὶ νῦν ἰδοὺ, ἐγὼ οἶδα ὅτι οὐκέτι ὄψεσθε τὸ πρόσωπόν μου ὑμεῖς πάντες, ἐν οἷς διήλθον κηρύσσων τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ Θεοῦ. ²⁶ Διὸ μαρτύρομαι ὑμῖν ἐν τῇ σήμερον ἡμέρᾳ, ὅτι καθαρὸς ἐγὼ ἀπὸ τοῦ αἵματος πάντων ²⁷ οὐ γὰρ ὑπεστειλάμην, τοῦ μὴ ἀναγγεῖλαι ὑμῖν πᾶσαν τὴν βουλὴν τοῦ Θεοῦ. ²⁸ Προσέχετε οὖν ἑαυτοῖς καὶ παντὶ τῷ ποιμνίῳ, ἐν ᾧ ὑμᾶς τὸ Πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον ἔθετο ἐπισκόπους, ποι-meum; and consequently all that that Version (evidently a free rendering of the general sense) can do, is greatly to confirm the view which I have taken of the true origin of this pet reading of our pair of Critics.

25. καὶ νῦν ἰδοὺ, &c.] It is unnecessary, in order to reconcile this with the fact, almost certain, that the Apostle did again visit Proconsular Asia, after his release from imprisonment at Rome, to suppose, with some, either that all the Presbyters now present were dead when he again visited Asia, or (with others) that the Apostle means to say, he shall not see them all again. We have only to understand the Apostle as here speaking in τῷ πνεύματι, according to his spirit, or mind, and therefore (as he said just before) μὴ εἰδὼς, not certainly knowing that it would be so, but presaging such from the threatening intimations he had received. Indeed, the form old ὄντι, or even old ὄντι, is perpetually used in the best Class. writers to denote something far short of certain knowledge, and only rising to opinion, or present persuasion. Comp. supra iii. 17, and infra xxvi. 27, and see my note on Thucyd. vi. 34.

26. μαρτύρομαι] 'I solemnly affirm to you,' namely, by calling God to witness.

— In this disputed passage the MSS. present no less than six readings; namely, τοῦ Θεοῦ: τοῦ Κυρίου: τοῦ Χριστοῦ: τοῦ Θεοῦ καὶ Κυρίου: τοῦ Κυρίου Θεοῦ: and τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ. The relative merits of these are discussed by Wetst., Griesb., Kuin., and Dr. Pye Smith, Script. Test. vol. iii. p. 66, sq., who decide in favour of Κυρίου. On the contrary, other Critics, as Mill, Bengel, Wolf, Venema, Michaelis, Ernesti, Valcknaer, Matthæi, Bp. Middl., Gratz, and Rinck, reject Κυρίου, and almost all read Θεοῦ; though some, as Griesb., Matthæi, and Middl. prefer τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ. Of the recent Editors, Lachm. and Tisch. read Κυρίῳ, Scholz and Alf. Θεοῦ. As to myself, I have hitherto, while retaining τοῦ Θεοῦ, admitted, with Matth. and Middl., καὶ Κυρίου, but in smaller character. On, however, re-considering this puzzling question, aided by such data for final decision as I have been enabled to obtain from extensive collation, examination of documents, and weighing internal evidence, I trust, in the balance of equity, I have been induced to alter my opinion. Perplexing as the state of the evidence may appear, it is not a little cleared by the consideration that three out of the six vv. ll., namely, τοῦ Χριστοῦ, τοῦ Κυρίου Θεοῦ, and τοῦ Θεοῦ καὶ Κυρίου, are scarcely entitled to that name, being evidently modifications of the other three, and, themselves resting on very slender authority, are of little value except to aid us in drawing the balance as to three real various readings, of which the evidence stands as follows:—1. Κυρίῳ is supported by A, C, D, E, and 14 cursives (I add Lamb. 1182); by the Copt., Sahid., and Arm. Versions, and some Fathers, chiefly Latin. 2. Τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ Θεοῦ is supported by C, G, H, and nearly 100 cursives (I add 4 Lamb. and 5 Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16), none of much antiquity or consequence, but of different families. 3. Τοῦ Θεοῦ is supported by the most ancient uncial, B, and 20 cursives, as Tisch. reckons; but, from evidence set forth by Scholz, many more; to which I add Harl. 5115 and 5537, omitted by the Collators, the latter of the 11th century, and Alexandrine recension. As to the reading which combines the two, Κυρίῳ and Θεοῦ, in whichever order, would seem excluded by a fundamental Canon of Criticism. This reduces the various readings to two,—Κυρίῳ and Θεοῦ, and undoubtedly the external authority for the former is greatly superior in number of MSS. and antiquity; on which ground, it would seem, it has been received into the text by Lachm. and Tisch. As to internal evidence, it draws two ways; but, on the whole, I apprehend, inclines in favour of Θεοῦ, as Mr. Alf. has gone far to prove. And if the scales hung ever so evenly, Pauline usage—which ought to have due weight in such a question—would turn the scale. Now the probabilities for and against the use of the expression ἐκκλησία τοῦ Θεοῦ here may, with Mr. Alf., be fairly argued thus:—'Is it per se probable, that Paul should use an expression which no others else occurs in his writings, nor indeed in those of his contemporaries? Is it more probable, that the early scribes should have altered an unusual expression for an usual one, or that a writer so constant to his own phrases should here have remained so? Besides,—in most of the places where Paul uses ἐκκλησία τοῦ Θεοῦ, it is in a manner precisely similar to this,—as the consummation of a climax, or in a position of peculiar solemnity; cf. 1 Cor. x. 32. xv. 9. Gal. i. 13. 1 Tim. iii. 5, 15.' On the whole, then, I quite agree with Alf., that since it is more likely that the alteration should have been to Κυρίῳ than το Θεοῦ,—more likely that the speaker should have used Θεοῦ than Κυρίου, there is good reason to decide in favour of the received reading, as Mr. Alf. has done; though we have, both of us, been influenced by second thoughts in our final decision.

— διὰ τοῦ ἰδίου αἵματος] ‘The Lamb is God, the Son of God, very God of very God, and so the blood of this Lamb is the blood of God. And it is this dignity of his nature that especially setteth so huge a value upon his blood, that it is of an infinite price, of infinite merit, able to satisfy an infinite justice, and to appease an infinite wrath.’ (Bp. Sanderson, Serm.) To advert to a matter of verbal Criticism,—Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read διὰ τοῦ αἵματος τοῦ ἰδίου, from A, B, C, D, E, and 20 cursives; to which I add two very ancient and valuable Lamb. copies, 1182 and 1184. It may be the true reading, but there needs stronger authority, to prove that it is. Internal evidence is equally balanced; for while the text. rec. may be, as Alf. pronounces, ‘a correction for simplicity,’ not noticing the emphasis; so may the other be a correction to introduce the emphasis, not heeding simplicity.

29. St. Paul here adverts to the reason for this solemn admonition, namely, the danger which would shortly overtake the Church from false teachers, whose rapacity would be as great as their hypocrisy. We have here the same metaphor as at Matt. vii. 15, 16 (where see note); though in the present instance there is a tacit allusion to the case of the shepherd, or his watchdogs appointed to guard the flock, gratifying their voracity by even preying on the flock itself. Comp. 2 Cor. xi. 20. In addition to rapacity and hypocrisy, the Apostle in the next verse subjoins the sowing of heresies and schisms, such as those of Phygellus and Hermogenes, and others, who afterwards promulgated the Nicolaitan errors.

— Here γὰρ and τοῦτο are cancelled by Alf., who pronounces the words to be interpolations, to connect and strengthen the sentence. The only authority of any weight against the text. rec. is for the reading ἐγὼ οἶδα ὅτι, found in A, B, C, D, and 6 cursives, which is edited by Lachm. and Tisch., but which is evidently a correction of style; and certainly a pure Class. writer would not have written τοῦτο and ὅτι. Besides, the evidence against τοῦτο is next to nothing,—only 5 cursives; and the γὰρ is quite as likely to have been lost by carelessness of scribes, as to have been introduced by Critics; and it is defended by all the MSS. except a dozen, and confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Version. — λύκοι βαρεῖς] meaning ‘false teachers,’ who will gratify their greediness by being burdensome to you, ἐν βάρεϊ ὄντες, as it is said in 1 Thess. ii. 6.

30. διεστραμμένα] ‘erroneous.’ So Arrian opposes δόγματα ὁρθὰ τοῖς διεστραμμένοις καὶ στριβλά. The metaphor is the same as that in our Adjective wrong, ‘twisted from the truth.’

32. παρατ. — τῷ Θεῷ καὶ τῷ λόγῳ τῆς χάριτος α.] I am still of opinion, that the Hendiad. is not to be brought in here, as if it only meant ‘merciful promise.’ As to τῷ δυναμένῳ, I am, on further consideration, induced to think that though it may be referred, as it is by most recent Expositors, to λόγῳ τῆς χάρ., ‘to the word of his grace’ in the Gospel, and though it may seem confirmed by Heb. iv. 12, comp. with Isa. xlix. 2, and Jer. xxiii. 29, yet, as Dodd. long ago observed, ‘it cannot be said to give as inheritance, however it may edify and build us up in the faith;’ hence it is best referred to Θεῷ, with most of the ancient Expositors, and of the modern by Beza, and by Calv., who, after ably handling the expression τῷ λ. τῆς χάρ., and showing the true force of the words kept separately, adverts to δυναμένῳ, and decides that it must not be referred to λόγῳ, but to Θεῷ, and shows why the words were added. By τοῖς ἡγιασμένοις here (and at xxvi. 18. Eph. i. 18, and Heb. x. 10, 14) are denoted not simply Christians, nor even ‘those who have washed worthy of their high calling in baptism,’ but those who have been cleansed from the pollution of sin, freed from its power, and endued by God, through the Spirit, with a principle of holiness; as is evident from 1 Cor. vi. 11, ἀλλὰ ἀτελούσασθε, ἀλλὰ ἡγιασθητε, &c., where see note.

33. What is here said was evidently suggested by the conduct of the false teachers, so opposite to his own. By ἱματισμός is meant that handsome clothing, which among the Hebrews was reckoned part of any one’s wealth. See Matt. vi. 19. 2 Kings v. 26. Such, it might have been supposed, he had accepted as presents. At the next words there is a forcible appeal (frequent in Paul’s Epistles) to the recollection of his converts in proof of his entire disinterestedness.

^{34.} αἱ χ. αὐ.] 'these hands,' holding them up. By the same expressive action, as on another occasion, infra xxvi. 29, παρ. τῶν δισ. τούτων.

^{35.} ἀντιλαμβάνεσθαι.] 'to assist;' lit. 'to bear up;' see note on Luke i. 54. By τῶν ἀσθενούντων we are to understand, not (as Beza, Calv., Neand., and Thol. explain) 'the weak in faith,' but 'the poor,'—as Chrys., Hamm., Kuin., and Olsh., who adduce as examples Aristoph. Pac. 636. Eur. ap. Stob. cxv. They might have added Eur. Suppl. 433. El. 39. Thucyd. i. 5, 1, where see my note. But, strictly speaking, this is not the sense; but, as appears from the antithetic κοπιῶντας, those who from sickness, or general infirmity, are unable to provide themselves with the necessities of life. Comp. Hdot. ii. 47, ὑπ' ἀσθενείας βίον,—the very sense of ἀσθενούντας in the passage of Aristotle.

—μακάρίον ἰστί, &c.] Render: 'More blessed of God is it to give than,' &c., magis juvat, &c. This is one of the sayings of our Lord unrecorded in the Gospels (see John xxi. 19.), of which, no doubt, there were then many circulated among the Christians, and some of which are recorded by the early Fathers; on which see Fabric. Cod. Apoc. New Test. i. 131, and espec. the very scarce tract of Koerner de Sermonibus Christi ἀγάφους, Lips. 1776, 8vo., to whose examples I am enabled to add another from the Epistle of Barnabas adduced by Dr. Lardner, Credib. p. ii. vol. i. p. 47, 'Sicut dixit Filius Dei, Resistamus omni iniquitati, et odio habeamus eam.'

XXI. 1. ἀποσπασθ. ἀ. α.] The sense, 'having gotten (or 'gone') away,' falls short of the true force of the expressive term ἀποσπ., which does not denote simply 'going away,' but, suitably to the regretful feeling implied in the foregoing words, κλαυθμὸς ἐγένετο, and ὀδυνώμενοι, serves to mark 'unwilling departure by separation' (the βίαν of Chrys.), which is expressed in the ancient Versions.

^{2.} διαπερῶν] lit. 'passing through,' or 'over,' 'making its passage.' On Ῥόδον just before, in addition to the passages adduced by Wetstein, and by Conybeare and Howson, I would point to a fine description of the island in its flourishing state in Aristid. t. ii. p. 341, and to a very sublime one of the earthquake which destroyed its capital in t. ii. 340; the scene was very similar to that given of the earthquake at Lisbon.

^{3.} ἀναφανέντες τὴν Κύπρ.] Wets. well compares Theophranes, p. 392, περιεφέροντο ἐν τῷ πελάγῳ, ἀναφανέντων δὲ αὐτῶν τὴν γῆν, ἰδὼν αὐτὴν οἱ στρατηγοί. Mr. Smith (Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul) remarks on this as the expression of an eye-witness, and one acquainted with the phraseology of seamen, 'who, in their own language, appear to raise the land on approaching it.' 'But,' remarks Mr. Alford, 'would not this rather apply to the Active Participle?' Certainly it would; but perhaps Mr. Smith thought it might be taken in an Active sense, which would be admissible. Even the Active form does not, I believe, occur (for the passage of Lucian, cited by Wets., is wide of the purpose); but, if it did, it would correspond to the Latin nautical phrase 'aperire terram,' and its opposite 'abcondere terram;' and so we say, 'to make a land,' i. e. 'to make it appear.' They are all nautical phrases, and to be explained on the same principle, as popular expressions of unscientific persons. As to the construction here, the difficulty must not be evaded by calling in the θεὸς ἀπὸ μηχανῆς of Hypallage, but by appealing to an acknowledged principle, applicable to many verbs; which, while in the Active voice they govern an Accus. of thing, and Dat. of person, when put in the Passive the Dat. becomes the subject, and the Accus. is retained but by an ellipsis of some preposition. Other nautical terms occur just after in εὐών., ἐπλ., κατήχ., and ἀποφορ., on all of which see my Lex. The last of them, ἀποφ., is used with the popular inexactness of such terms; the sense being, 'was soon to unload.'

4. ἀνευρόντες τοὺς μαθ.] 'having found out by inquiry the disciples' (that were in the city). This sense, as depending on the presence of the Article, which was wrongly marked by Bp. Middleton as to be expunged, I long since explained and vindicated; and it has since been adopted by Professor Scholefield and Canon Tate. On the Apostle 'tarrying there seven days,' I would observe, that this was doubtless done that he might (as he had previously done at Troas) be able to associate with the disciples at Tyre in public worship on the Lord's day.

— ἀνευρόντες τοὺς μαθητάς.] My judgment on the genuineness of the Article, and its true force, has since been confirmed by the opinion of Prof. Scholefield and Mr. Tate (Cont. Hist., p. 137), and also by Lachm. and Tisch., who retain the Article. Thus we may render, 'having found out the disciples,' i. e. as hearing that there were such. The case is quite different at ch. xxviii. 14, εὐρόντες ἀδελφοὺς, where the absence of the Article in all the MSS. requires the version 'having found brethren;' i. e. (as Mr. Tate explains) 'without expecting it from any previous knowledge.' I doubt not that the Article was, in the present passage, cancelled by those Critics who wished to make the two passages exactly square, not perceiving their intrinsic difference.

— ἔλεγον—μὴ ἀναβαίνειν.] There may seem something strange in these persons, under the impulse of the Spirit, bidding Paul not to go to Jerusalem, when it was doubtless the will of God that he should go. To remove this difficulty, some Commentators take διὰ τοῦ Πνεύματος to mean 'ex proprio spiritu.' Such a phraseology, however, would be unprecedented. The expression must retain its force, and be rendered 'under the influence of the Holy Spirit.' The difficulty, however, which that sense involves, will be effectually removed by supposing in ἔλεγον—μὴ ἀναβαίνειν an idiom common in all the best writers (e. g. Thucyd. vi. 29, ἔλεγον—ῥαλιν); by which the words, being used popularly, may be understood as limited by some clause omitted; and thus the sense will be, 'they counselled him [if he valued his safety] not to go to Jerusalem.' The Spirit did not order them to bid him not go, but only enabled them to predict that there would be danger in his going. It is plain that Chrysost. so took the words; for he explains them by προφητεύουσι τὰς θλίψεις. And that Paul so understood what they said is certain; for if he had really regarded himself as forbidden by the Holy Spirit to go, he would not have gone.

6. εἰς τὰ ἴδια.] See John xvi. 32, and note. Τὸ πλοῖον, i. e. the ship by which they had sailed from Patara to Tyre.

7. τὸν πλοῖον διαν.] The only mode of removing the difficulty involved in this expression is (with Markland and Kuinoel) to take the Aorist as put for the Present, and render, 'thus accomplishing our voyage,' i. e. the sailing part of our journey from Neapolis to Syria.

8. ἐξελθόντες—εἰς Κ.] It is not quite certain whether they went by sea, or by land; and Commentators are divided in opinion. The latter, however, is far the more probable; the ship, it seems, stopping at Ptolemais longer than they could conveniently stay. Besides, the route by land to Caesarea was more convenient than that by sea, which would have been tedious and dangerous, on account of doubling the formidable promontory of Mount Carmel. The words of περὶ τὸν Παῦλον, not found in very many MSS., Versions, and Fathers, and all the early Editions, have been cancelled by all the Editors, from Matth. and Griesb. downwards,—with reason, since they doubtless came from the marginal Scholium, and thence into the general text. The τοῦ before ὄντος is cancelled by Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from A, B, C, G, H, and about 15 cursives; to which I add 1 Lamb. and 3 Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B. x. 16. Mr. Alford thinks it was introduced for precision; but it rather arose from the τοῦ preceding; it might, however, be absorbed in the τοῦ, though that were less likely.

9. θυγ. καθ. τίσεσ.] In 5 of the uncial MSS. there are 3 variations of order here; Lachm. adopts one from A, B, and one cursive (I add Lamb. 1182). They are mere alterations of Critics; accordingly, I retain the text, rec., which I find in all the Lamb. and Mus. copies except one.

10. ἡμῶν is omitted in A, B, C, H, and 7 cursives (to which I add Trin. Coll. B, x. 16), and is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; and indeed internal evidence is rather against it; but it was probably omitted by the scribes; for this omission of one of the two Genitives Absolute is very rare in the New Test. I find ἡμῶν in all the Lamb. and Mus. copies.

11. The τε after δῆσας is omitted in several ancient MSS., and is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; and internal evidence is rather against it. They also read ἐαυτοῦ for αὐτοῦ, from A, B, C, D, E, and many cursives (to which I add 3 Lamb. and 2 Mus. copies). Alf. pronounces the text rec. 'an alteration, from supposing it was Paul's hands and feet that were bound.' But this is impossible, unless the Reviser had been as stupid, as Mr. Alf. was careless, in not perceiving that the text rec. is αὐτοῦ, not αὐτοῦ, and that in both the Stephanic and Elzevir Editions. Indeed, I suspect that the ἐαυτοῦ originated in Critics who wished to make it more distinct, that it was Agabus' own hands and feet that were bound. In doing what he did Agabus followed the custom of the Prophets of the Old Test., who, in order to impress more strongly on men's minds the things which they had to communicate (whether predictions or declarations), used to employ some corresponding external sign symbolical of the thing. See Jerem. xiii. 1. xxvii. 2, seqq. 1 Kings xxii. 11. Ezra iv. 1—13. See also Hos. i. 2, seqq. It was not, however, confined to the Prophets; for the employment of symbolical actions was a custom generally prevalent in the early ages, both among the Jews and the Gentiles.

For τὰς χεῖρας καὶ τοὺς πόδας, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read τ. π. καὶ τ. χ., from B, C, D, E, G, H, and 30 cursives (to which I add 4 Lamb. MSS. and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16). Alf. pronounces the text rec. to be 'a correction' from Luke xxiv. 39, 40; as if it were likely that the Reviser would think it worth while to correct in so minute a point. I wonder that Alf. did not perceive, with Meyer, that the reading πόδας

κ. τ. χ. arose from its being the natural order of binding, of course from Critical correction. Alf., however, urges that it is the natural order of narration, and thus the matter might remain unsettled ad Græcos Kalendas. See, however, what I have said on Matt. xxii. 13, which strengthens the evidence for the reading of the uncials here.

12. οἱ ἐντόπιοι 'the inhabitants [of the place];' see my Lex. in v.; i. e. with the limitation suggested by the circumstances of the case, the Christians of Cæsarea.

13. τί ποιεῖτε This Markland regards as a popular form of expression (as at Mark xi. 5) for τί βούλεσθε; comparing Theophr. Char. 9, τί βούλονται λογοποιεῖν; The full sense taken with καὶ συνθρ. is, 'What mean ye to do by this weeping and breaking?' &c., i. e. 'weeping and [thus] breaking up, crushing my courage?' Note that in συνθρπτ. the συν has an intensive force, as in συντρίβειν, συγκλῆν, συντρίκειν, &c., and denotes the utter destruction of a thing, by its being crushed together, and thus broken up. Comp. Zonar. Annal. t. i. p. 30, ἰδῶν καὶ συνθρυπτόμενος, ἵνα μὴ, δακρύων, καταφανῆς γένοιτο. The γάρ following is highly significant, q. d. 'for courage I have—being ready to,' &c.

15. After all that has been said, or perhaps can be said, by myself, or others, I am now of opinion that ἀποσκ. may be the gloss, and ἐπισκ. the true reading. I find it in 2 Lamb. and all the Mus. copies, and in Trin. Coll. B, x. 16. See my Lex. on both these terms.

For Ἱερουσαλὴμ, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read Ἱεροσόλυμα, from A, B, C, D, E, and some 4 cursives, of which, however, two of the most important are wrongly stated. The reading is not in the Leic. MS. (teste Jacks.), and I do not find Matthæi's MS. noted in his Edition. However, it occurs in the best of the Lamb. copies, No. 1182; and internal evidence is in its favour.

16. ἄγοντες—Κυπρίῳ The sense of the passage is plain, but the construction not so clear.

17 Γενομένων δὲ ἡμῶν εἰς Ἱερουσόλυμα, ἀσμένως ἐδέξαντο ἡμᾶς οἱ ἀδελφοί. 18 Ἡ δὲ ἐπιούση εἰσῆι οὗ Παύλου σὺν ἡμῖν πρὸς Ἰάκωβον, πάντες τε παρεγένοντο οἱ πρεσβύτεροι. 19 Καὶ ἀσπασάμενος αὐτοὺς, ἐξηγείτο καθ' ἑν ἑκαστον, ὃν ἐποίησεν ὁ Θεὸς ἐν τοῖς ἔθνεσι διὰ τῆς διακονίας αὐτοῦ. 20 Οἱ δὲ ἀκούσαντες ἐδόξαζον τὸν *Θεὸν, εἰπόν τε αὐτῷ· Θεωρεῖς, ἀδελφέ, πόσαι μυριάδες εἰσὶν Ἰουδαίων τῶν πεπιστευκότων καὶ πάντες ζηλωταὶ τοῦ νόμου ὑπάρχουσι. 21 Κατηχήθησαν δὲ περὶ σοῦ, ὅτι ἀποστασίαν διδάσκεις ἀπὸ Μωϋσέως τοὺς κατὰ τὰ ἔθνη πάντας Ἰουδαίους, λέγων μὴ περιτέμνειν αὐτοὺς τὰ τέκνα, μηδὲ τοῖς ἔθνεσι περιπατεῖν. 22 Τί οὖν ἐστί; πάντως δεῖ πλήθος συνελθεῖν ἀκούσονται γὰρ ὅτι ἐλήλυθας. 23 Τοῦτο οὖν ποι-

Most Commentators, from Grotius to Kuinoel, recognize here a Hebraism, the datives Μνάσωνι τινι Κυπρίῳ being, they say, put, like the Heb. ל, for accusatives with πρὸς. Yet the two Apostles were not going to, as we say, call on Mnason, but to lodge at his house. Hence it is better to suppose here a frequent idiom (usually called Ἀθέσι, but in reality extending to the common dialect), by which a noun is attracted to the case of the relative, as in Matt. vii. 2. Luke i. 4. Acts xxii. 24. Rom. vi. 17. ὀψηκούσατε ἐκ καρδίας εἰς ὃν παρεδόθητε τύπον διδασκῆς, for τῷ τύπῳ διδασκῆς, εἰς ὃν παρ. Thus in the present passage it is as if there had been written ἀγούσας (ἡμᾶς, to be supplied from ἡμῶν preceding) παρὰ Μνάσωνι τινι, Κυπρίῳ, ἀρχαίῳ μαθ. (for ἐξ ἀρχῆς) παρ' ᾧ ἔσπισθώμιν. Examples of the phrase ἀγειν παρὰ are adduced by Bornemann.

17—XXIII. 35.—Paul at Jerusalem, where he is apprehended, and sent a prisoner to Caesarea.

17. For ἰδέξαντο, A, B, C, E, and 12 cursives (to which 1 add Lamb. 1182, Trin. Coll. B, x. 16, and Harl. 31 [Covell 2] passed over by Mill) have ᾤδεξ; but the authority is insufficient; espec. since internal evidence draws two ways. Ἐδέξαντο may have been, as Alf. says, 'a substitute for a simpler word'; and ᾤδεξ may have been a substitution of a more significant term by the Critics; but the latter is the more probable; and at any rate, Mr. Alf. ought not to have received the reading, since in a passage of the same writer at Luke ix. 11, where Lachm. and Tisch. adopt ᾤδεξ from 4 uncials and 15 cursives, he votes in favour of the text. rec. ἰδέξ, since ᾤδεξ arose from Critical alteration suggested by Luke viii. 4. Why then should not the present ᾤδεξ have been a Critical alteration, suggested by Luke viii. 40, and ix. 11?

18. εἰσῆι—πρὸς Ἰάκωβον] meaning πρὸς τὸν αὐτοῦ οἶκον. A very rare idiom, at least in the Class. writers; for not one of the examples adduced by Schleus., Wahl, and Bretsch. are to the purpose. One example alone, entirely such, I have noted in Posidipp. ap. Athen. p. 376, F, ὁ μάγειρος, ἵαν μιν πρὸς τὸν ἰδιότην (i. e. 'one who does not profess cookery') εἰσῆι, &c.

20. For text. rec. Κύριον, A, B, C, E, G, and 25 cursives (to which I add 4 Lamb. and one Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16), have

Θεόν. It is confirmed by all the ancient Versions, except the Sahid. and Arab.; and even in them the Translators may have meant to write Deum. It is, I doubt not, the true reading, and the other a mistake of scribes, who not unfrequently confound KN and ΘN. The phrase δοξ. τὸν Θεόν occurs very frequently in St. Luke's Gospel and in the Acts, and occasionally in Matthew and Mark (not in John), also in Paul's and in Peter's Epistles; δοξ. τὸν Κύριον no where; nor is Luke likely to have used it.

—Θεωρεῖς] The term here (as infra xxviii. 10. Mark xvi. 4. John iv. 19) denotes the perception of a thing from knowledge and experience, so as to take note of it. In πόσ. μυρ. there seems a species of hyperbole; since there is good reason to think that at no time did the number of believing Jews consist of 'very many myriads.' Comp. Heges. ap. Euseb. H. E. ii. 23, with Origen in Joan. t. i. § 2, adduced by Alf., between whose two very different estimates the middle point will be the safest.

22. τί οὖν ἐστί;] Seemingly a popular formula, similar to our 'What then? i. e. 'what then [is to be done]?' See more on 1 Cor. xiv. 15. Supply πρατικόν.—Πάντως δεῖ πλήθος συν.: meaning, 'it is unavoidable but that a multitude should gather together';—δεῖ, like ἀνάγκη, denoting what necessarily follows from any thing, what must and will happen; as here, from that curiosity and desire to hear news usually found in every multitude. The absence of the Article forbids the sense 'public assembly.' It has, however, been thought a matter of doubt whether the words δεῖ πλήθος συνελθεῖν are genuine. They are expunged by Tisch., but only on the authority of B, C, and 5 cursives (to which I can make no addition); very insufficient authority; espec. since internal evidence is quite in favour of the words, which were more likely to be removed from being misunderstood, than inserted.

23. τοῦτο οὖν ποίησον] This is of course to be regarded as the language of advice, not of command. For a justification of the conduct of the Apostle in thus conciliating the Jews, to the compromise, as some have thought, of the leading doctrines of the Gospel, see Dr. Hales, iii. 536, sq., and Canon Townsend. Suffice it to say, that though the Apostle taught that Jewish as well as Gentile Christians are freed from the observance of the Mosaic Law, yet he never forbade the Jewish converts to observe it, or any part of it, on the score of expediency; since he himself occasionally did so, that he might 'gain the more' to Christ. See 1 Cor. ix. 20. Acts xvi. 3.

— εὐχὴν ἔχοντες ἐφ' ἑαυτῶν] 'bearing upon themselves a vow,' viz. by their being under the obligation involved in it. Whether this was a vow of Nazarites, or a vow undertaken on account of recovery from sickness, Expositors are not agreed. An example of the latter occurs in Jos. Antt. ii. 15, 1, on Berenice's vow; but from the terms ἀγνίσθητι καὶ ξυρήσωνται just after, the latter is the more probable.

24. ἀγνίσθητι σ. α., καὶ δαπάν. ἡ α., 'undertake the same abstinence and purity enjoined by the vow, and pay their expenses for them,'—namely, those of the sacrifice, on going to the Temple, for the purpose of being released from the vow by shaving the head. And in the ξυρ. is implied the payment of the expenses having been made. Thus the phrases to cause any Nazarite to be shorn, and to pay his expenses, came to be convertible. So Maimonides says, 'Mihi incumbit ut radatur Nazareus per me.' So in Jos. Antt. xix. 6, 1, it is said of Agrippa, that, after his return from having obtained the kingdom from the emperor Claudius, ἰλθὼν χαριστηρίας ἐξέπληρωσε θυσίας, οὐδὲν κατὰ νόμον ἀπολιπὼν, διὸ καὶ Ναζιραῖον ξυρᾶσθαι δειτάξει μάλα συχυοῦς. Hence it appears that this was regarded as a highly religious act, and very suitable to accompany the sacrifice of thanksgiving, after deliverance from some great peril, or obtaining some great and unexpected good. For γνῶσι, A, B, C, D, E, and above 12 cursives, and 2 Lamb. MSS., have γνῶσονται, which is edited by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; and internal evidence is in its favour.

26. διαγγέλλων τὴν ἐκπλ.—ἀγνισμοῦ] 'giving public notice [to the Priests] of the completion of the days of purification,' meaning the full observance of the days of, &c.,—importing, in other words, that he intended to keep in full the proper number of days (see Numb. vi. 9); which the persons themselves, it seems, had not been able to do, because they could not provide the offering at their expiration. Every one, it seems, was allowed to fix the period of his votive purification, either when he commenced it, or at any time during its course; so that the Priests had proper notice, in order to make the necessary arrangements as to the victims, &c.

28. βοηθεῖτε] The sense is, 'Come to our aid [in apprehending this person].' A sense of the word very frequently occurring in Thucyd. and the best writers. Ἑλλήνας is, as I have shown, the generic plur. for the sing., where, as here, one only is meant.

—κατὰ τοῦ νόμου—διδάσκων] i. e. passing the partition-wall between the inner and outer wall was, as we learn from Philo, θάνατος ἀπαράιτητος.

30. εἶλκον αὐτὸν ἔξω τοῦ ἱερ.] i. e. in order (as Chrys. suggests) to avoid polluting the Temple with murder; and also, it should seem, to be more unrestrained, than the Priests and Levites could decently permit them to be; who appear to have themselves closed the doors, in order to preserve the Temple from profanation, and be thought to have no hand in whatever might be the result of this rioting.

33. δλ. δλ. δις† See note supra xii. 6. Perhaps in the present case the feet also were bound with a chain; at least so we may suppose from supra v. 11.

— ἐπυνθ. τίς ἂν εἴη† 'interrogated (him) who he might be, and what he had done.'

34. ἐβόων† Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ἐπεφώνουν, from A, B, D, E, and 12 cursives; to which I add Lamb. 1182, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16; all the other Lamb., and all the Mus. copies, have ἐβόων, which may, as Alf. thinks, be a correction to a simpler word. I should think ἐπεφ. a correction to a stronger and more forcible one, were not ἐπεφ. elsewhere used by Luke in his Gospel, and Acts xii. 22, and xx. 24. Παρεμβολή properly signifies 'a place where tents παρεμβάλλονται.' But it here denotes 'the barracks' belonging to the castle of Antonia. And this is confirmed by the ἀναβαθμούς just after; for the castle of Antonia was situated on an eminence.

35. τοὺς ἀναβ.† meaning 'the flight of stairs' leading from the portico of the Temple to the castle of Antonia, which nearly joined the Temple, being built (as we find from Joseph. Bell. v. 5) at an angle of it. As a complete description of this tower, and setting before us the whole scene of this occurrence as a picture, I lay before my readers the full and most graphic account of the great historian:—'Ἡ δὲ Ἀντωνία κατὰ γωνίαν μὲν δύο στοῶν ἔκειτο τὸν πρώτου ἱεροῦ, τῆς τε πρὸς ἰσπέραν, καὶ τῆς πρὸς ἄρκτον. Διδόμῃτο δ' ὑπὲρ πέτρας πεντηκονταπύχους μὲν ὕψους, περικρήμουν δὲ πάσης

Ἐπειτα πρὸ τῆς τοῦ πύργου δομησῆς τριῶν πηχῶν τεῖχος ἦν, ἐνδοτικῶν δὲ τούτου τὸ πᾶν ἀνάστημα τῆς Ἀντωνίας ἐπὶ τεσσαράκοντα πῆχεις ἤγειρετο. — βαστάζεσθαι† 'carried on their shoulders,' for security against the violence of the people. Priceus, Wets., and Conyb. and Hows., however, think the term does not mean that he was literally carried, but was borne off his legs by the press; and they adduce a passage of Dio Chrys., p. 141, where a person is described as βαδίζοντα μετὰ πολλοῦ πλῆθους, καὶ μὴδὲ ἰκβαίνοντα τῆς γῆς, ἄλλ' ὑψηλὸν φερόμενον ὑπὸ τοῦ ὄχλου. Here, however, nothing is said about a great press, but only that Paul was carried off and borne in the arms of the soldiers, to secure him against the violence of the mob.

36. For κρίζον, MSS. A, B, E, and 15 cursives (I add 3 Lamb. and 2 Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16), have κρίζοντες, which is received by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. Internal evidence is in its favour, and it is probably the true reading. As to the reading of D, ἀναρεῖσθαι (for αἶρε, as the Latin Version shows), found also in the Æthiopic Version, and the Lamb. 1182, 1, m. ἀναρεῖ, they are both alterations of Critics, who (according to their wont) alter what they do not understand.

37. The τι is omitted in D, G, H, and 50 cursives (1 add 1 Lamb. and 2 Mus. copies), and cancelled by Tisch., but retained by Lachm. and also by Alf., though in his note he characterizes the text. rec. as 'an emendation.' The other reading is not likely to be such. It was probably removed as unnecessary; and for the same reason passed over in some ancient Versions. The Ἑλληνιστὶ γινώσκεις; is not a Latinism, since we find in Xen. Cyr. vii. 5, 11, τοὺς Συρίῳ ἐπισταμίοντες. The interrogation here, as often, imports surprise, where we should use the mark of exclamation; and so the Æthiop. Translator took it.

38. Αἰγύπτιος, &c.] Namely, an Egyptian Jew, who set himself up at Jerusalem for a prophet. A full account of this may be seen in Joseph. Antt. xx. 8, 6, and Bell. ii. 13, 5; between which, however, and what is here said, a considerable discrepancy exists; for Josephus, in the latter passage, reckons them at 30,000. Many methods have been devised to remove the discrepancy; of which the only effectual one is that supplied by the aid of criticism, applied to the texts of the two writers, in one of whom there must be some error, doubtless proceeding from the scribes. Now there is no reason to suppose any error in St. Luke's text, since the MSS. agree, and the number is a very probable one. The error, therefore, must rest with Josephus; and that there is a corruption in that writer is certain; the number 30,000 being incredibly large. Besides, while in his Antiq. he says the number was 30,000, and of these πλείστοι (very many) were slain, yet in his War, though he does not mention the total number, he says that 400 were slain, and 200 taken prisoners. Now 400 cannot be considered very many out of 30,000. To remove this discrepancy, Aldrich would in the Antiq. read δισχιλούς, instead of διακοσίους. A conjecture, however, little probable; and, indeed, it is not the number of the prisoners that we are concerned with, but that of the slain. There is little doubt that the error rests with Josephus. Yet I would not, with Aldrich, read in the Antiq. τετρακισχίλους, on purpose to make the accounts of Josephus and

St. Luke exactly agree. But for τρισχιλούς I would read τρισχίλους, which will make Josephus consistent with himself; for certainly 600 may be considered very many out of 3000. And thus the difference between the accounts in Josephus and that of the Chiliarch (not St. Luke) becomes of small consequence, and they might be diversely estimated. It is scarcely necessary to observe how frequently χιλίοι and μύριοι in composition with dis, &c. are confounded, from the similarity of the contractions and single letters to denote the numbers in question. Had, indeed, the real number been 30,000, Josephus would not have omitted in his Antiq. to advert to the great multitude of persons. Thus we see that, though the members of the two different accounts are inconsistent with each other, yet the discrepancy is not irreconcilable; and therefore it is not necessary to leave them out of the question, as Mr. Alfred proposes.

— σικαρίων] lit. cut-throats: from sica, the short cutlass, or long dagger (of Oriental origin, in fact the Kris of India and China), found among Egyptian and Assyrian antiquities, which was carried under the arm, like the Italian stiletto. So, too, Joe. Bell. ii. 13, 3, describes the sica as εἶδος ληστῶν—ταῖς ἐσθῆσιν ὑποκρύπτοντες μικρὰ ξιφίδια. And comp. also Bell. vii. 8—11, and Antt. xx. 8, 5. From what Josephus says, it would seem that the sicarii were at first private assassins, or cut-throat robbers; and, after that, rebels and brigands of the most ferocious character.

39. οὐκ ἀσήμευ πόλ.] An elegant litotes, as Eur. Ion 8, πόλιν οὐκ ἄσ. to denote 'a celebrated city.' So Stephan. Byz. calls it πόλις ἐπισημοτάτη.

XXII. In this able address, most skilfully contrived, so as to answer the purpose of conciliation, the Apostle first vindicates himself from the charge of throwing contempt on the Mosaic ordinances, by adverting to his Jewish birth and education, which would render the thing highly improbable; he then states his former hatred of Christianity, and relates the circumstance of his miraculous conversion. He, moreover, alleges his praying in the Temple as a proof that he could mean no disrespect to it; and finally he explains the reason why he preached to the Gentiles.

1. Ἄνδρες ἀδελφοί, καὶ πατέρες.] I have thus pointed, because ἀνδρ. ἄδ., while it lit. means

ἀδελφοὶ, καὶ πατέρες, ἀκούσατέ μου τῆς πρὸς ὑμᾶς * νυνὶ ἀπολογίας. ² Ἀκούσαντες δὲ ὅτι τῇ Ἑβραϊδί διαλέκτῳ προσεφώνει αὐτοῖς, μᾶλλον παρέσχον ἡσυχίαν. Καὶ φησιν ³ Ἐγὼ μὲν εἰμι ἀνὴρ Ἰουδαῖος, γεγεννημένος ἐν Ταρσῷ τῆς Κιλικίας, ἀνατετραμμένος δὲ ἐν τῇ πόλει ταύτῃ παρὰ τοὺς πόδας Γαμαλιήλ, πεπαιδευμένος κατὰ ἀκρίβειαν τοῦ πατρῶου νόμου, ζηλωτὴς ὑπάρχων τοῦ Θεοῦ, καθὼς πάντες ὑμεῖς ἐστε σήμερον ⁴ ὅς ταύτην τὴν ὁδὸν ἐδίωξα ἄχρι θανάτου, δεσμεύων καὶ παραδιδούς εἰς φυλακὰς ἀνδρας τε καὶ γυναῖκας ⁵ ὥς καὶ ὁ ἀρχιερεὺς μαρτυρεῖ μοι, καὶ πᾶν τὸ πρεσβυτέριον παρ' ὧν καὶ ἐπιστολὰς δεξάμενος πρὸς τοὺς ἀδελφούς, εἰς Δαμασκὸν ἐπορεύομην, ἄξων καὶ τοὺς ἐκέισε ὄντας δεδεμένους εἰς Ἱερουσαλὴμ, ἵνα τιμωρηθῶσιν. ⁶ Ἐγένετο δέ μοι πορευομένῳ καὶ ἐγγίζοντι τῇ Δαμασκῷ περὶ μεσημβρίαν, ἐξαίφνης ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ περιαστράψαι φῶς ἰκανὸν περὶ ἐμέ. ⁷ Ἐπεσόν τε εἰς τὸ ἔδαφος, καὶ ἤκουσα φωνῆς λεγούσης μοι Σαοὺλ, Σαοὺλ, τί με διώκεις; ⁸ Ἐγὼ δὲ ἀπεκρίθην Τίς εἰ, κύριε; εἶπέ τε πρὸς με Ἐγὼ εἰμι Ἰησοῦς ὁ Ναζωραῖος, ὃν σὺ διώκεις. ⁹ Οἱ δὲ σὺν ἐμοὶ ὄντες τὸ μὲν φῶς ἐθεάσαντο, καὶ ἔμφοβοι ἐγένοντο τὴν δὲ φωνὴν οὐκ ἤκουσαν τοῦ λαλοῦντός μοι. ¹⁰ Εἶπον δέ Τί ποιήσω, Κύριε; ὁ δὲ Κύριος εἶπε πρὸς με Ἀναστὰς πορεύου εἰς Δαμασκὸν κάκει σοι λαληθήσεται περὶ πάντων ὧν τέτακταί σοι ποιῆσαι. ¹¹ Ὡς δὲ οὐκ ἐνέβλεπον, ἀπὸ τῆς δόξης τοῦ φωτὸς ἐκείνου, χειραγωγούμενος ὑπὸ τῶν συνόντων μοι ἦλθον εἰς Δαμασκόν. ¹² Ἀνανίας δέ τις, ἀνὴρ εὖσεβῆς κατὰ τὸν νόμον, μαρτυρούμενος ὑπὸ πάντων τῶν κατοικοῦντων Ἰουδαίων, ¹³ ἐλθὼν πρὸς με καὶ ἐπιστάς εἶπέ μοι Σαοὺλ ἀδελφέ, ἀνάβλεψον κἀγὼ αὐτῇ τῇ ὥρᾳ

(on the principle of apposition) 'men who are my brethren,' might not unfaithfully be rendered 'brethren.' The expression καὶ πατέρες (occurring nowhere else in Scripture), is a notable addition to account for which we may suppose that among those present were some persons venerable on account of age or official dignity, ancient Scribes and Doctors of the Law.—I have edited νυνὶ for νῦν, from all the most ancient uncials, and very many cursives; to which I add all the Lamb. copies but one, some of the Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B. x. 16. The reading is adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.

2. παρίσχον ἡσυχίαν] Not an Hellenistic phrase; the same occurring in Dionys. Hal. Ant. ii. 32, τοῖς περιιστάσι διασημῆνας ἡσυχίαν παρασχεῖν, λέγει τοιαύτα. See also Jos. Antt. v. 9.

3. ἀνατετραμμένος—πεπαιδ.] The construction here has been disputed; some Expositors joining παρὰ τοὺς πόδας I. with the words preceding; others with the words following. Of these two modes the former is preferable. As to the regularity imparted to the passage by the other construction, that is little characteristic of Scriptural, or, indeed, of ancient style in general.

—Ἀνατ. παρὰ τοὺς πόδας answers to what we call 'being educated under such and such a master,'—by an Hellenistic idiom, alluding to the posture in which Jewish scholars received instruction from their masters. A Class. writer would have used παρὰ with a Dative of the person educating. So Plut., Oper. Moral. t. ii. p. 434, τεθραμμένος παρὰ τῷ σοφωτάτῳ Χείρωνι. In the words following, πεπαιδευμένος κατὰ ἀκρίβειαν.

—[ἡλ. ὑπ. τοῦ Θεοῦ] meaning, 'of God's law,' namely, what he then esteemed such. Comp. 1 Kings xix. 10, 14, 'I have been very jealous for the Lord God of hosts,' i. e. meaning for his honour, with Rom. x. 2. And so Arrian, Epict. ii. 14, ὡς Θεοῦ τοῖνον [ἡλωτῇ τὰ ἔξῃ πάντα καὶ ποιῶν καὶ λέγων. In so expressing himself, the Apostle intended delicately to refute the charge brought against him, of blaspheming the Law; speaking of it in terms such as to tacitly admit its divine origin.

5. ὁ ἀρχιερεὺς] meaning, 'the then High Priest,' now living.—μαρτυρεῖ μοι is to be taken in a popular sense, for 'He can bear me witness,' 'while I appeal to him.'

ἀνέβλεψα εἰς αὐτόν. ¹⁴ ὁ δὲ εἶπεν Ὁ Θεὸς τῶν πατέρων ἡμῶν προεχειρίσατό σε γινῶναι τὸ θέλημα αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἰδεῖν τὸν Δίκαιον, καὶ ἀκοῦσαι φωνὴν ἐκ τοῦ στόματος αὐτοῦ. ¹⁵ ὅτι ἔσθ' μαρτυρῶν αὐτῷ πρὸς πάντας ἀνθρώπους, ὃν ἐώρακας καὶ ἤκουσας. ¹⁶ Καὶ νῦν τί μέλλεις; ἀναστὰς βάπτισαι καὶ ἀπόλυσαι τὰς ἁμαρτίας σου, ἐπικαλεσάμενος τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ Κυρίου. ¹⁷ Ἐγένετο δέ μοι ὑποστρέψαντι εἰς Ἱερουσαλὴμ, καὶ προσευχομένου μου ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ, γενέσθαι με ἐν ἐκστάσει, ¹⁸ καὶ ἰδεῖν αὐτὸν λέγοντά μοι· Σπεῦσον καὶ ἔξελθε ἐν τάχει ἐξ Ἱερουσαλὴμ· διότι οὐ παρέδξονται σου τὴν μαρτυρίαν περὶ ἐμοῦ. ¹⁹ Ἐγὼ εἶπον Κύριε, αὐτοὶ ἐπίστανται, ὅτι ἐγὼ ἤμην φυλακίζων καὶ δέρων κατὰ τὰς συναγωγὰς τοὺς πιστεύοντας ἐπὶ σέ· ²⁰ καὶ ὅτε ἐξεχείτο τὸ αἷμα Στεφάνου τοῦ μάρτυρός σου, καὶ αὐτὸς ἤμην ἐφεστὼς καὶ συνευδοκῶν [τῇ ἀναίρεσει αὐτοῦ], καὶ φυλάσσω τὰ ἱμάτια τῶν ἀναιρούντων αὐτόν. ²¹ Καὶ εἶπε πρὸς με· Πορεύου, ὅτι ἐγὼ εἰς ἔθνη μακρὰν ἐξαποστελῶ σε. ²² Ἦκουον δὲ αὐτοῦ ἄχρι τούτου τοῦ λόγου, καὶ ἐπήραν τὴν φωνὴν αὐτῶν, λέγοντες· Αἶρε ἀπὸ τῆς γῆς τὸν τοιοῦτον· οὐ γὰρ καθῆκεν αὐτὸν ζῆν. ²³ Κραυγαζόντων δὲ αὐτῶν, καὶ ῥιπτούν-

13. ἀνάβλεψον] See my Lex. Here the two senses are blended together, as supra vii. 52.

14. τὸν Δίκαιον] 'the Just One.' 'the Messiah.' See note supra iii. 14. vii. 52, and Luke xxiii. 47, comp. with Rev. iii. 7.

16. βάπτισαι καὶ ἀπόλυσαι τὰς ἁμ.] meaning, 'wash away thy sins by baptism, as an ordinance expressive of the washing away of sin.' Comp. 1 Cor. vi. 11, καὶ ταῦτα τινας ἦτε, ἀλλὰ ἀπελούσασθε, and comp. Heb. x. 22.

19, 20. Meaning to say, 'Lord, as these (the Jews) well know how bitterly I persecuted those who believed in thee, they must be convinced it is only on irresistible conviction, that I am become a preacher of the faith I once persecuted; and, accordingly, I may hope that they will hearken to my preaching.' See Dodd. After συνευδοκ. (on which see my Lex.) the words τῇ ἀναίρεσει αὐτοῦ are omitted in A, B, D, E, and one cursive, also in the Vulg. and some other Versions, and are cancelled by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. They may have been interpolated from Acts viii. 1; but it is strange that that should be the case in all the copies but four; for Alford's alii is but a repetition of Scholz's alii, which rests on Mill's Barb. 1. But those Barbarini MSS. are nearly in as bad credit as the Veleian readings, as Tisch. must think who, with his usual honesty, queries the alii. For my own part, I cannot think it right to expunge what is found in all the MSS. except four (for it is in every one of the Lamb. and Mus. copies, and it is in Trin. Coll. B, x. 16), confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Version. I cannot help suspecting that the words were cancelled by Critics, who scrupled at the propriety of the phrase as followed by a Dative of action, for the words must be meant for both Participles; and if the words be removed, then there will be a very harsh brevity not in St. Luke's manner. On φυλ. τὰ ἱμ. see note supra vii. 58.

21. πορεύου] The Lord overrules this plea by simply repeating the order.

22. αἶρε ἀπὸ τῆς γῆς] Alluding, it may be supposed, to the law which ordered that persons guilty of sacrilege should suffer the punishment of καταποντισμός. So Philo, ap. Euseb. viii. p. 392, νόμον κειμένον τὸν ἱερόσυλον κατακρημνίζεσθαι ἢ καταποντίζεσθαι.

— οὐ γὰρ καθῆκεν] 'non debuerat,' or 'decuerat,' 'it were not proper.' As for the reading, I find it confirmed by the Lamb. and Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16.

23. ῥιπτούντων τὰ ἱμάτια] This cannot mean what some understand, 'rending their garments;' or, as others, 'shaking their garments, as if in rage.' More probable is the sense assigned by others, 'tossing up their garments;' this being regarded as an action betokening approbation, proceeding from certain persons too far off to otherwise participate in the tumult. I see not, however, how ῥίπτω will bear the sense 'toss up,' nor how it could be thought to import any thing but disapprobation and anger. The true interpretation seems to be that of Grotius, Tirinus, Parkh., and Bretschn., 'tossing off, or flinging off their garments,' as a preparation for violence; a symbolical action quite in unison with the violent expressions of such of their companions as stood near, the whole forming a lively picture of rabid fury. Comp. Plato de Rep. p. 665, 'Ἦγοῦ ἐπὶ σὲ πάνν πολλοὶς οἷον ῥίψαντας τὰ ἱμάτια, γυμνοῦν λαβόντας ὃ τῇ ἑκάστῳ παρέτυχεν ἄπλοον, θεῖν διαταγμένον. In κοινοῦ τὸν βαλλόντων εἰς τὸν ἀέρα we have another symbolical action, quite in unison with the preceding; for Grot., Wetst., and

των τὰ ἱμάτια, καὶ κονιορτὸν βαλλόντων εἰς τὸν ἄερα, ²⁴ ἐκέλευσεν αὐτὸν ὁ χιλιάρχος † ἄγεσθαι εἰς τὴν παρεμβολήν, εἰπὼν μᾶστιξιν ἀντάξασθαι αὐτὸν, ἵνα ἐπυγνῶ δι' ἣν αἰτίαν οὕτως

Kuin, rightly take it of kicking up, or otherwise throwing up dust into the air, which, as appears from the Class. citations of Wetst., and the accounts of modern travellers, was then, and still is, in the East, a frequent mode of raising a tumult.

—ἐπεφώνουν αὐτῷ] The word signifies literally to raise the voice AT a person; and has therefore two senses, either acclamo, applaud, as in Acts xii. 22, or inlamo, exclaim against, as here: so our old Engl. 'to cry out upon' any one.

²⁵ ὡς δὲ προέτεινεν αὐτὸν τοῖς ἱμαῖσιν] There are few passages more perplexed by variety of reading, and diversity of interpretation, than this. Not less than six or seven var. lectt. exist; but the only material diversity is between the singular προέτεινεν, and the plural προέτεινον or προέτειναν. Before entering into the question as to which of these two should be preferred, I would advert to one main error that runs through the interpretations of most modern Commentators,—which is, the taking ἱμαῖσι in the sense scourges; q. d. 'they stretched him for the scourges.' But there is, I apprehend, no authority for such a use of ἱμαῖν in the plural. The true interpretation of the word is that of the ancient and some modern Expositors, who take it in the ordinary sense straps, or thongs, as Mark i. 7. Luke iii. 16. John i. 27. The plural is here used because, it seems, the prisoner was fastened to the post with two straps. So Dio Cass. xi. 49, Ἀντίγονον ἱμαστίγῃσι, σταυρῷ προδήσαντες. In προέτ. we have an allusion to the posture of the sufferer, necessarily a stooping one, as the position of the post was an inclined one. The post was sometimes a short stone pillar. So, Eschin. p. 9. 11, πρὸς τὸν κίονα, scil. δεθίντα αὐτὸν ἱμαστίγῃσι. Soph. Aj. 108, πρὶν ἂν δέξειε, πρὸς κίον' ἑρκίσον στήνῃ μᾶστιγι—ἄστα φοινίχεται θάψῃ. Comp. Pind. Pyth. iv. 417, βόλαις δῖσαις ἀνάγκας ἔντυον αὐχίνας. These straps, or belts, were, it should seem, fastened about the person something like the harness of our horses, and were then attached to the post by some ring or buckle there provided to receive them. In short, the mode was, I apprehend, exactly like that now adopted in Russia, in the punishment of the knot; of which Captain Frankland, in his late Travels in Russia, vol. ii., gives the following description:—'It is a large solid piece of wood, about seven feet in height, thrust end-ways in the ground in an inclining posture. At the top is a groove cut for the reception of the neck of the sufferer; at the two sides are two other grooves for the arms. On the part fronting the spectators, opposite to the side on which the sufferer is placed, are three iron rings, to which the hands, neck, and feet of the criminal are made fast by thongs.' But, to advert to the sense, which will depend on the reading. Now, on a further consideration of this debated question, it appears to me that the text rec., though found in the greatest number of MSS., arose, not as Alf. thinks, from Critical correction, to suit the subject to ὁ χιλιάρχος, but simply from error of scribes. It is quite indefensible, because it was the office of the licitors, not of the centurions, much less of the tribune, to fasten the prisoner to the post. Accordingly, a plural form must be adopted; and of the two which are extant, προέτειναν is to be preferred; and it is found in MSS. B, G, and 20 cursives; to which I add Lamb. 1181, 1182, 1183, 1184, Cov. 2, 4 (in Brit. Mus.) omitted by the Collator, also (Æcumen., and the Oxford Catena; and it is edited by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and also by Alf., who renders, 'and while they were binding him down with the thongs!' But the Aor. I cannot be taken for the Imperf.; and therefore we must render, 'and when they had stretched him forward for the thongs,' i. e. to be strapped. Thus it seems that Paul waited until the licitors had stretched him forward, and were going to strap him to the post. Then he uttered his protest against the wrong done. For it was forbidden by the law that any free citizen of Rome should be bound, much less scourged: so Dion. Hal. Ant. 1853, 7, τὸν δ' ἵππερον—μᾶστιξιν αἰκισάμενοι καθάπερ ἀνδρόποdon, ἀπέκτειναν. Every one of the ancient Versions confirms both the plural form, and the Plasperf. tense. I am, however, inclined to suspect that in the passage of Dio Cass. the reading is προσδήσαντες, for there is no authority for προδῶ where the prep. would not suit the verb. And my emendation is confirmed by various passages which I could cite; suffice it to adduce Artemid. On. 1, 78, προσδέθει κίονι πολλὰς ἐλαβας πλῆγας, καὶ ὑπὸ τοῦ δεσπότων ἐντάθη ('stretched tight'). This stretching was, it seems, an important part of the operation, by which the person was stretched tight, that the lashes might be more keenly felt. This we find expressly touched on in the following passage of an ancient Greek Martyrologist from a tract entitled Martyrium Taruchi, περιελόντες αὐτοῦ τὸ πάλιον, καὶ περιζώσαντες ('after strapping with thongs'), τείνατε, καὶ νύτρον ὁμοῖς τύψατε—δήσαντες αὐτὸν—τείνατε, καὶ νύτροι ὁμοῖς σχίσατε τὸ πῶτον αὐτοῦ—τείνατε αὐτόν.

²⁸ ἐγὼ πολλοῦ—ἐκτησάμην] These words imply surprise how a person of Paul's mean appearance could possess this privilege. Perceiving which, the Apostle makes the rejoinder, 'Ay, but I am even so by birth.' On the various modes whereby the freedom of Rome could be attained by foreigners, i. e. by merit or favour, by money, or by being freed from servitude, and on the peculiar nature of the freedom claimed by the citizens of Tarsus, see my Recens. Synop.

³⁰ ἵστησιν εἰς αὐτούς] The full sense seems to be, 'set him up to speak face to face [as to the charges they brought against him].' The more Classical term would be καθίστησκιν, on which see my note on Thucyd. iv. 84, 1.

XXIII. 1. ἀτενίσας τῷ συνεδ. 'after having looked stedfastly at the council.' Not, as many have supposed, for the purpose of close observation, in order to discover the character of his judges, but simply thereby to fix their attention upon himself, and what he was about to say. So supra iii. 4, it is said, Peter and John 'looked fixedly on the cripple, and bade him look at them, in order to draw his attention to what was about to be said and done. We may suppose, too, that the Apostle meant thereby to show the Council that he could then as confidently look them in the face as heretofore, when he had been in the highest honour and trust. And thus the action corresponded with the words of his speech, which, as Calvin and Newcome remark, 'are meant to obviate the unfavourable impression occasioned by his appearing before the Council as a malefactor.' Hence his speech commences with the solemn assurance, that he had at all times, now as heretofore, acted πάσῃ συνειδήσει, according to the best light of his conscience towards God, whether well or ill informed; that he had never acted from sinister motives, but always from a sense of duty.

—πεπολίτευμαι] 'I have conducted myself.' The word properly signifies 'to act as a citizen,' and sometimes, 'to have the conduct of state affairs;' see my note on Thucyd. i. 84, 5. Hence it came to mean, 'to conduct oneself;' 'behave;' and, here, by the addition of τῷ Θεῷ (with which construction comp. 2 Macc. vi. 1, π. τοῖς νόμοις) the expression contains a firm, yet modest declaration of his innocence, founded on the consciousness of integrity. This assertion of habitual conscientiousness is characteristic of the Apostle. See 2 Tim. i. 3, and v. 19. Comp. 1 Pet. iii. 16.

² As to the Ananias here mentioned, there is no doubt about the person, but much difference of opinion whether he was then the High Priest, or was usurping the office. The latter view has recently been quite refuted by Wieseler, Chron. p. 76, note, who has shown that Ananias was then exercising the office in full right, and not, as I have heretofore supposed, holding it provisionally. He was, however, not long after, as we find from Jos. Antt. xx. 8, 8, deposed from his office by Felix, a little before his departure. Nevertheless, we learn from the same authority that he still had much power, which he used with lawless violence, until he at length reaped the fruits, and, after having 'sown the wind, he reaped the whirlwind,' being six years after assassinated by the sicarii. Jos. Bell. ii. 17, 9.

—ἐπέταξε τοῖς παρ. α. τύπτειν, &c.] Meaning by this action to intimate both displeasure at what had just been said (see ver. 4), and an inhibition to speak further. In the former view I would compare Aristoph. Lysist. 635, αὐτὸς γὰρ μοι γίγνεται τῆς θοῆς ἐχθρὰς πατάξαι τῆσδε γράδος τὴν γνάθον. Also 1 Kings xxii. 24, ἐπέταξε τὸν Μ. ἐπὶ τὴν σιαγόνα. Into this unjustifiable violence towards the Apostle Ananias was hurried, we may suppose, 1. by Paul's solemn protestations of innocence, which gave the lie to the accusations of the Chief Priests; 2. by his addressing them as Brethren, not as Fathers, or Rulers of Israel; 3. from his having been liberated by Roman soldiers, and throwing himself on their protection as a Roman citizen.

3. τύπτειν σε μέλλει, &c.] Whether these words are, what most Commentators regard them, a prediction, may be greatly doubted. Certainly they are not, what Camerarius, Zeger, Limborch, Wetstein, Heumann, and most of the recent Commentators suppose, a formula malé precantis; q. d. 'God smite thee, as thou hast smitten me,'—a sense not at all permitted by the words. We may, I think, simply understand them as expressing a full persuasion, conviction, that God would punish Ananias for this outrage,—a view supported by the opinion of Chrysostom, Jerome, and Augustin, and not a few eminent modern Expositors.

—τοίχε κεκονιαιμένη.] A frequent metaphor to designate hypocrisy. See note on Matt. xxiii. 27. It is probable that Paul had in mind his Lord's saying.

—καὶ σὺ κáθη, &c.] The καὶ when prefixed to interrogative sentences, implying admiration, is best rendered isane? and so? so then?

5. οὐκ ᾔδειν—ἀρχιερεὺς.] That the Apostle should have been ignorant of the presence of the High Priest, would seem strange; and has been variously accounted for. Of the many solutions of the difficulty offered by Commentators, three only seem to have any semblance of truth: 1. that of Chrysost., Dionysius, Cajet., Gataker, Wolf, Michaelis, and Townsend, who go far to prove, from the history of the times, as recorded in Josephus, that the office of the High Priest was then vacant, and that Ananias was only discharging its duties pro tempore; which Paul, having been in Jerusalem only a few days, might not be aware of: 2. that of Bps. Sanderson and Mann, Bengel, Wetst., Pearce, Valcknaer, Schott, Kuin., Olsh., and Neander, who take the expression οὐκ ᾔδειν in the sense, 'I did not reflect, or consider' (as it were excusing a momentary impetuosity, from want of thought), as in Eph. vi. 8. Col. iii. 24, and some passages of the Class. writers cited by the Commentators. 3. It has been suggested by some, including Mr. Alford, that the imperfection of St. Paul's vision (supposed to be implied in δτενίσας) was the cause of his ignorance and mistake in the matter in question; so that he heard the insolent order given, but knew not from whence it proceeded. For my own part, I am not satisfied with any of the three solutions. The first is wholly untenable. That of Mr. Alford is preferable, but is founded on a most gratuitous assumption, as to the defect of Paul's sight. Surely the use of δτενίσας here or elsewhere gives no countenance to the notion in question, which, however, may have some ground of truth. Though not perfectly satisfied with the second solution, I greatly prefer it, since I see little or no positive objection. For as to that of Meyer, approved by Alford, that the sense thus ascribed is never the meaning of εἰδέναι, it may not be the proper sense, but I see not why it may not have the occasional meaning of εἰδέναι, in popular language as a colloquialism. Such was probably the view taken by Valckn., a far more competent judge of such a matter than any of our German Critics of the day. Besides, Mr. Alford scarcely does justice to the view, by representing it as an acknowledgment of rash and insubordinate language. The only one that I can myself adopt is that expressed above as laid down by one of the most consummate of Philologists.

6. γνοὺς δὲ ὁ Παῦλος, ὅτι, &c.] And so taking advantage of the circumstance to gain over one party to his side by setting at variance both parties; an expedient founded on the maxim, 'Divide, et impera,' exactly such as that put in practice on a similar occasion by Josephus; see his Bell. Jud. ii. 21, 3. That Paul was surely quite justified in adopting this politic course,—since he knew that he had no chance of a fair trial, inasmuch as personal odium would prevent his judges from doing him justice,—is undeniable.

—ἐκραξεν.] MSS. B, C, and one cursive, have ἐκραξεν, which is adopted by Lachm. and Tisch. Griesb., Scholz, and Alf. retain ἐκραξε, rightly; for though the MSS. are, as Conybe. says, indeed divided, yet so that all except three have ἐκραξεν, for ἐκραξ is not in any one of the Lamb. or Mus. copies, or in Trin. Coll. B, x. 16. The truth is that the other is a mere error of scribes, who perpetually confound ζ and ξ (which in some MSS. are scarcely discernible, especially in the verb κράζω): hence the same doubt about the reading occurs elsewhere; e. g. in Matt. xv. 22. xx. 31. Mark iii. 11, where for ἐκραξε Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ἐκραξον, though only from four uncials and several cursives; at Rev. vi. 10, for ἐκραξ, they edit ἐκραξε, rightly; and certainly the Aorist form is the one most used in the Greek of the New Test. and Sept.

—περὶ ἐλπίδος καὶ ἀναστ. νεκ.] It is not necessary here to suppose a Hendiadys. We may render (the Article being omitted after the Preposition), 'for the hope of the dead and their resurrection.' Comp. Ps. xvi. 9, and 1 Thess. iv. 13.

δουκαίων, καὶ ἐσχίσθη τὸ πλῆθος. ⁸ Ἰσχυροὶ μὲν γὰρ λέγουσι μὴ εἶναι ἀνάστασιν, μηδὲ ἀγγελον μήτε πνεῦμα· Φαρισαῖοι δὲ ὁμολογοῦσι τὰ ἀμφότερα. ⁹ Ἐγένετο δὲ κραυγὴ μεγάλη· καὶ ἀναστάντες [οἱ] γραμματεῖς τοῦ μέρους τῶν Φαρισαίων διεμάχοντο, λέγοντες· Οὐδὲν κακὸν εὐρίσκομεν ἐν τῷ ἀνθρώπῳ τούτῳ· εἰ δὲ πνεῦμα ἐλάλησεν αὐτῷ ἢ ἄγγελος—[μὴ θεομαχῶμεν.] ¹⁰ Πολλῆς δὲ γενομένης στάσεως, εὐλαβηθεὶς ὁ χιλιάρχος μὴ διασπασθῇ ὁ Παῦλος ὑπ' αὐτῶν, ἐκέλευσε τὸ στράτευμα καταβὰν ἀρπάσαι αὐτὸν ἐκ μέσου αὐτῶν, ἄγειν τε εἰς τὴν παρεμβολήν.

8. ἀμφότερα] Render: 'them both,' 'both of them.' The Apostle adverts to two points of difference between the two parties,—namely, the resurrection, and the existence of immaterial beings: πνεῦμα and ἄγγελος being considered as falling under the same head. Such being the essential difference existing between the tenets maintained by the two parties in question, and the Pharisees in this respect coming far nearer to Christianity than the Sadducees; hence the Apostle, far from employing any thing like artful reasoning or dialectical subtilty, did no more than simply conciliate in his favour, and engage in his defence, that one of the two parties which might justly be said to come nearer to the truth.

9. εἰ δὲ πνεῦμα, &c.] Here we have only to suppose an Aposiopesis, such as is often found in the best writers, when something which we do not care to directly mention, is omitted. So here, 'what if an angel, or other spirit, have spoken to him.'

The angel, or spirit, is thought to have reference to the two kinds of appearance, which those who were inclined to think with Paul ascribed to the Divine vision narrated by the Apostle; for those appearances were always supposed to take place through the medium of an angel, or a spirit.

— μὴ θεομαχῶμεν] These words, not found in four uncial and three cursive MSS., and several Versions, and some Greek and Latin Fathers, have been cancelled by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; perhaps rightly, for internal evidence is against them. The words were probably added by certain Critics, who could not tolerate the Aposiopesis (though that has, in effect, no little force), and who thought something more should be expressed. This view derives confirmation from Chrys. and the Pesch. Syr. Version, where there is an addition in other words,—namely, 'what evil, i. e. ground of offence, is there in this?'

10. For εὐλαβ. Lachm. edits φοβηθεῖς, from A, B, C, E, and a good many cursives (I add Lamb. 1182, 1184); but scarcely any amount of external evidence would suffice where internal is so opposed; for φοβ. was evidently a correction of the Critics, who chose to substitute for an

Hellenistic a pure Greek term; for it never occurs in this sense in the Classical writers, and only rarely in the Sept. and Jos., and once elsewhere in the New Test., in Heb. xi. 7. There is great reason, however, to think that the sense here is, 'having a care lest,' equivalent to, 'through caution lest Paul might be torn asunder.' This force of the Particip. is found in Heb. xi. 7, εὐλαβηθεὶς κατισχύσας κίβωτον, where, as here, the sense may be (what is expressed in the margin), 'being wary through caution.'

— τὸ στράτευμα] meaning, the detached force on duty in garrison at the fortress of Antonia. So Hdn. iv. 6, 11, κελύει τῷ στρατεύματι (meaning, 'the prætorian detachment on duty at the palace') προσπισαίν τῷ πλῑθι.

— For ἄγειν, Lachm. and Tisch. (1 ed.) edit ἀπάγειν, from MSS. A and E; while Tisch., in his 2nd ed., restores ἄγειν, rightly; since it is demanded by vastly superior external authority (to which I add Lamb. MS. 1182), confirmed by internal evidence, considering that ἀπάγειν may be regarded as either a gloss on ἄγειν, or as a false correction, of which an example occurs in Rev. xiii. 10, where see note.

11. Παῦλε] omitted in A, B, C, E, and nine cursives; to which I can only add Lamb. 1182. Besides which, external evidence, confirmed by the Versions, is against it.

12. For ποιήσαντες τινες τῶν Ἰουδαίων συστ., MSS. A, B, C, D, and several cursives (I add Lamb. 1182, 1184), with some Versions, have ποιήσαντες συστ. οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι, which has been received by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; but injudiciously, the genuineness of the common reading being attested by a certain harshness of idiom and peculiar character frequent in the New Test. writers; whereas the other reading has every appearance of being an alteration of the Alexandrian Critics, to make the passage run more smoothly. That the words should, as Alf. pronounces, have been 'corrected to suit v. 13,' is too improbable to be thought of. As to what he further says, that 'the copyists thought it unlikely that all the Jews were engaged, and so altered it to τινες τῶν Ἰουδαίων, λέγοντες μήτε φαγεῖν μήτε πιεῖν, ἕως οὐ ἀποκτείνωσι τὸν Παῦλον. ¹³ (Ἦσαν δὲ πλείους τεσσαράκοντα, οἱ ταύτην τὴν συνωμοσίαν πεποιηκότες.) ¹⁴ οὔτινες προσελθόντες τοῖς ἀρχιερεῦσι καὶ τοῖς πρεσβυτέροις εἶπον Ἀναθέματι ἀνεθεματίσαμεν ἑαυτοὺς μηδενὸς γεύσασθαι, ἕως οὐ ἀποκτείνωμεν τὸν Παῦλον. ¹⁵ Νῦν οὖν ὑμεῖς ἐμφανίσατε τῷ χιλιάρχῳ σὺν τῷ συνεδρίῳ, ὅπως [αὐριον] αὐτὸν καταγάγῃ πρὸς ὑμᾶς, ὡς μέλλοντας διαγινώσκειν ἀκριβέστερον τὰ περὶ αὐτοῦ ἡμεῖς δὲ, πρὸ τοῦ ἐγγίσει αὐτὸν, ἔτοιμοι ἐσμεν τοῦ ἀνελεῖν αὐτόν. ¹⁶ Ἀκούσας δὲ ὁ υἱὸς τῆς ἀδελφῆς Παύλου * τὸ ἐνεδρον, παραγενόμενος καὶ εἰσελθὼν εἰς τὴν παρεμβολήν, ἀπήγγειλε τῷ Παύλῳ. ¹⁷ Προσκαλεσάμενος δὲ ὁ Παῦλος ἕνα τῶν ἑκατοντάρχων, ἔφη Τὸν νεανίαν τοῦτον ἀπάγαγε πρὸς τὸν χιλιάρχον· ἔχει γάρ τι ἀπαγγεῖλαι αὐτῷ. ¹⁸ Ὁ μὲν οὖν παραλαβὼν αὐτόν, ἤγαγε πρὸς τὸν χιλιάρχον, καὶ φησιν Ὁ δέσμιος Παῦλος, προσκαλεσάμενός με ἡρώτησε τοῦτον τὸν νεανίαν ἀγαγεῖν πρὸς σε, ἔχοντά τι λαλῆσαί σοι. ¹⁹ Ἐπιλαβόμενος δὲ τῆς χειρὸς αὐτοῦ ὁ χιλιάρχος, καὶ ἀναχωρήσας κατ' ἰδίαν, ἐπυνθάνετο· Τί ἐστίν, ὃ ἔχεις ἀπαγγεῖλαί μοι; ²⁰ ^k Εἶπε δέ * Ὅτι οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι συνέθεντο τοῦ ἐρωτῆσαί σε, ὅπως αὐριον εἰς τὸ συνέδριον καταγάγῃς τὸν Παῦλον, ὡς † μέλλοντές

and then transposed it for euphony,' I answer that the copyists were never the alterers; that was reserved for the Revisers and Critics; and the hypothesis itself, however ingenious, wants far greater confirmation, and is strongly discountenanced by the fact,—that the Pesch. Syr. Translator must have had the text rec. in his copy; though Mr. Alford classes that Version with those against it. Internal evidence, indeed, seems against the text. rec., but not decidedly,—since it is very possible that the older reading may be a correction by the Critics, who seem to have had a dislike to the Pronouns so liberally inserted in the Hellenistic and Hebraistic Greek.

—ἀνθεματίσαν i.] This ἀναθ. implied 'the binding oneself under a curse to do any thing;' and was sometimes, as in the present case, accompanied with a resolution not to eat or drink until the accomplishment of the thing vowed. It appears that the Jews were much given to this banding of themselves together, in order to make away with any one whom they thought ought not to live; and especially when he was accounted to have deserved death by violating the Divine laws. So in Jos. Antt. xv. 8, 3, 4, we read of ten men binding themselves by an oath to encounter every danger in order to take the life of Herod, for his innovations in their religion, and for bringing in foreign customs.

15. On the forensic term ἐμφανίσαι, see my Lex.

The αῤριον here is not in A, B, C, E, and 12 cursives [not the Leicester MS.], (to which I add Lamb. 1182), and several Versions. It is probably an insertion from ver. 20.

—διαγινώσκειν ἀκριβέστερον τὰ περὶ αὐτοῦ] 'to examine, so as to determine more accurately the matters concerning him,' i. e. his case; so κοσμοσέ in Curt. vi. 11, 'diligentius cuncta cognoscere.' Of this use of the term Expositors have not adduced any apposite example; but such may be found in Dio Cass., p. 432, ὥστε μὴ καὶ αὐτὴ ἀναγκασθῶμεν ὑπὲρ τῶν πραγμάτων διαγινώκειν, 'to again go through and consider the matters.'

16. I have, in deference to the opinion of all the Critical Editors, now received τὸ ἐνεδρον for text. rec. τὴν ἐνέδραν, on strong external authority (to which I can add several Lamb. and Mus. copies), confirmed by internal evidence; ἐνεδρον being the Hellenistic to ἐνέδρα, the Class. Greek form. Yet, as ἐνέδρα occurs in all the copies at ch. xxv. 5, it may be the true reading here.

19. ἐπιλαβόμενος τῆς χειρὸς α., &c.] There is here not merely a common form of expression, to denote 'the taking any one aside;' for the words impart a graphic air to the context, as in Philo, τῇ δεξιᾷ λαβόμενος μόνος μόνῃ συμβουλεύει.

20. Πυνθ. here denotes, not 'to make inquiry,' but by impl., 'to find out by inquiry,' 'to ascertain, learn, or know;' as often in the best writers, from Homer down to Palsphatus. And this sense comes from the original signif., which is, 'to fathom,' 'get to the bottom' of a thing, as a well, fig. 'to get to the bottom of any matter, and thus ascertain and know all about it, as he who sounds does about the depth of water.'

For μέλλοντες, MSS. A, B, C, and 6 cursives (I add Lamb. 1183, l. m), the Copt. and Æthiop. Versions, have μέλλαν, which is edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. The true reading is difficult to be ascertained amidst the confusion of two readings, which attest the perplexity of the Revisers, who, it seems, were ignorant of the construction. Μέλλουσι is the most ancient, as found in the Pesch. Syr., Vulg., and Sahid. Versions. And this would seem confirmed by v. 15; though Alf. pronounces it to be ‘a correction’ from v. 15. But I cannot think that such would extend to all the copies but ten. Besides, as Matthæi remarks, ‘vix credibile est, Judæos adeo impudentes et stultos fuisse, ut Lysiam, virum honestum et prudentem, improbitatis et insidiarum participem facere tentarent.’ When I consider the paucity of the copies that have μέλλων, I cannot but suspect that μέλλων (for μέλλον) was an unfinished reading—there are many such, the termination usually placed at the top being omitted, from uncertainty as to the reading.

21. τὴν—ἐπαγγ.] Expositors are not agreed whether this term is to be explained promise, or order. There is much to be urged for either sense, but the context rather requires the latter. Render, ‘the order to be given by you, for Paul to be brought up.’

23. δεξιολάβους] Of this much debated term we have not sufficient information to enable us fully to determine its true sense. I have shown that it cannot designate the Tribune’s lictors, 200 being too many for that office; nor the Tribune’s body-guards, for the same reason, and because there is no evidence sufficient to prove it. I am still of opinion that the term designates a corps of light-armed troops in attendance on the battalion of heavy-armed, like the Roman lancoarii, except that they occupied, and covered, the right flank of the battalion; though they sometimes discharged other duties, as that of pickets, or scouts. I find my view confirmed by the suffrage of Meyer, who cites a passage of Constantine Porphy., where they are conjoined with the archers and peltastæ, but placed after, and distinct from them; Meyer, however, would derive the name from the corps grasping their weapon with the right hand. However, there would seem no reference to their position in line of battle, where they were probably never placed, being, it seems, merely used like the lancoarii, thus mentioned in Ammian. xxi. 13, ‘iter suum præire cum lanceariis et cæteris catervis expeditorum præcepit;’ which is confirmed by Theoph. Sim. iv. 1, προστάττει δὲ καὶ δεξιολάβους ἱκνηλατεῖν, &c., and so Suidas explains it by παραφύλαξ.—The plural κτῆνη, implies that there were two horses for Paul’s use; for in so long and rapid a journey he would require more than one horse.

25. περιέχ. τὸν τύπον τοῦτον] lit. ‘comprised in this form,’ ‘couched in these terms.’ A blending of two expressions, each found in some copies, περιέχουσι ταῦτα, and ἔχουσι τοῦτον τὸν τύπον: the latter of which propriety of language would require.—Τὸν τ. τ. is the Greek of common life; in which τύπος means form, as in 3 Macc. iii. 30, ὁ μὲν τῆς ἐπιστολῆς τύπος οὕτως ἔγγραπτο. There is no reason to suppose, with Valckn. and Kuin., that Luke has here given, not the letter, but only the substance of,—the Latin letter translated into Greek. It should rather seem that Luke wrote from a copy of the letter, preserved by himself, or by Paul, and obtained from those who kept the public records.

26. κρατίστῳ] The usual epithet in addressing a magistrate; as we say, ‘your Excellency.’ See note on Luke i. 3. On χαίρειν and ἐρίσωο, see note on Acts xv. 23.

27. σὺν τῷ στρατεύματι] Not ‘with an army,’ but ‘with the force [under my command];’ in order to conceal the fault he had committed.

³¹. ἤγαγον διὰ τῆς ν.—A.] From the ancient itineraries, brought to light by the researches of Reland, we are enabled to trace both the route generally, and the different stages of it; making 42 miles in all. But 42 miles would seem a distance too great for one night, even supposing all the rapidity of a forced march. And yet the words cannot without violence be explained in any other sense; nor is it necessary, since, by a forced march with picked troops, and by the aid of the cavalry, taking the infantry in rotation behind them, they might arrive at Antipatris in good time, so as to allow of the return, on that morning, of the infantry; though they may have rested for the day, and gone forward the next, which Alf. thinks permitted by τῇ δὲ ἐπαύριον. Though I doubt whether it can fairly be taken of any other morning than the one after the night of the journey. The troops might go part of the way that day, and return on the next to Jerusalem. The exact course of this nocturnal forced march to Antipatris, and the remaining course of the cavalry with St. Paul to Caesarea, has recently been ascertained by exact observation on the spot and the research of an American Missionary, the Rev. Eli Smith; the substance of whose matter (communicated to the American Bibl. Sac. vol. i. 438—496) has been given by Con. and Hows., vol. ii. 275, seqq., of which the following is an epitome:—The road runs for about three hours N. along the high mountainous region which divides the valley of the Jordan from the great W. plain of Judea. About midnight they would reach Gophna, and, after a short halt, they quitted the northern road, which leads to Neapolis, and turned towards the seacoast on the left. Presently they began to descend among the W. eminences and valleys, and their second halting-place was probably at Thamna (mentioned by Jos. Antt. xiv. 11, 2. Bell. iii. 3, 5. iv. 8, 1. 1 Macc. ix. 50), the present Tibnah. Then they proceeded, still descending, till about day break they came to the last halt, at the present village of Misdal Yaba, and overlooked the great plain of Sharon, going just up to its base on the W. The road now turned N. across the plain of Sharon. On the E. were the mountains of Samaria, bounding the plain in that direction, and on the left a line of low wooded hills, shutting it in from the sea. Between this higher and lower range stood Antipatris, so well described by Jos. Antt. xiii. 5, 1. Bell. i. 4, 7, and 21, 9,—a city of no inconsiderable note, though by this time it had become a semi-rutum oppidulum. But if this should be, as it probably is, the true route, the distance to Antipatris must have been far less than 42 miles, probably only 36 or 34, and thus might be gone over as above, διὰ τῆς νυκτὸς. The remaining course to Caesarea would be along the Roman road laid down in the Pentinger Table, and the Jerusalem Itinerary, through Bethar,—a distance of 28 miles. I need scarcely say, that thus all the real difficulty attending the interpretation of διὰ τῆς νυκτὸς and τῇ ἐπαύριον is removed, so that no straining of the sense will be necessary.

διακούετε ἀνὰ μίσην τῶν ἀδελφῶν ὑμῶν καὶ κρίνατε δίκαιως. Comp. διαγνώσκειν, ch. xxiv. 22.—For ἐκέλευσέ τε, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ἐκέλευσε, from A, B, E, and four cursives; to which I can add Lamb. 1184, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16. Alf. pronounces the text rec. 'an emendation of style;' and indeed the expression needed it. But I will not believe that Luke would write such unlicensed Greek as that; but I suspect that under the reading of those few cursives is concealed another reading lost by the carelessness of scribes, but which will, I doubt not, be found by the careful inquisition of collators,—namely, ἐκέλευσαν. The καὶ was lost by a very obvious cause, and then the Verb would easily pass into a Particip., especially since the terminations for -εν and -ας are very similar. That καὶ ἐκέλευσαν was read by the Pesch. Syr. and Æthiop. Translators is plain; and that it was the original reading is very probable.

XXIV. 1—XXVI. 32. Paul's imprisonment at Cæsarea.

1. μετὰ δὲ πέντε ἡμ.] Some understand this of 'five days' from Paul's arrival at Cæsarea; but I agree with Conyb. and Howa. that it is more natural to reckon them from Paul's departure from Jerusalem. This is confirmed by v. 11, at least according to the view taken, I think rightly, by Mr. Alford.—For τῶν πρεσβ., Lachm. and Tisch., ed. I, edit πρεσβ. τινὸς, from MSS. A, B, E, and 15 cursives; to which I add Lamb. 1184, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16. But Tisch., ed. 2, restores the text rec., which Alf. retains, anxious to release Lachm. from the charge of clumsiness; forgetful that in the preceding verse he had ascribed to him worse than clumsiness.

—ῥήτορος] The word properly denotes 'an orator;' but as orators, who harangued before the public assembly, sometimes made the causes of private persons confided to them,—so it came to signify 'an advocate,' and at length merely 'a pleader,' or 'barrister,' as here; on which class of persons see Geib. de Advoc., p. 602, and the matter from thence in Conyb. and Howa., vol. ii. 290; and also on Tertullus, and the peculiarly Latin character of his speech, see Conyb. and Howa., vol. i. pp. 3 and 4. Of the disputed phrase ἐνεφάνισαν τῷ ἡγ. κ. τ. II., 'they made or laid information to the governor against Paul;' it is a forensic term, recurring infra xxv. 2, 15, and found in Jos. Antt. x. 9, 3. xiv. 10, 12, and 12, 4; lit. 'showed cause why he should be arraigned;' and accordingly, Tertullus began to do so by making accusation.

3. εἰρήνης] The word here signifies 'public and political tranquillity,'—namely, by having been released from the troubles under which the Jews had laboured, of rebels, brigands, robbers, and other disturbers of the peace. So Jos. Antt. xv. 10, 1, says of Herod's putting down the robbers in Trachonitis, τοῦτε τὰ πονηροῦν ἐκ τῶν αὐτῶν κατέπαυσεν, καὶ τοῖς περίεξ ἀδελφὴν τὴν εἰρήνην παρίσχειν. And at Bell. i. 10, 5, he says that 'when Herod had put down the band of robbers, the people celebrated his praises, ὡς εἰς εἰρήνην αὐτοῖς παρών.' The more Class. term is ἡσυχία found in Pind. Pyth. viii. 1.

This flattering speech was quite in the manner of the age, as we may infer from several similar ones occurring in Josephus. In the present case the language is full of the basest flattery, in contradiction to known facts. From the xxth book of Jos. Antt. it is plain that Judæa had never before been in so bad a state as it was under the procuratorship of Felix, whose government was a tissue of injustice and tyranny. So that one might call to mind the words of Solomon (Wisd. xiv. 23), τὰ τοσαῦτα κακὰ εἰρήνην προσαγορεύουσιν, and a similar thought occurring in the 'Agricola' of Tacitus, where orators, like Tertullus, are said to have termed a like state of things in Britain as pacem. Again, another orator (even baser than Tertullus), one Nicolaus, in a speech to Agrippa, Jos. Antt. xx. 2, 4, uses even more fawning language of the Roman oppressors, who drove the unhappy Jewish people to despair by their merciless extortions; not even blushing to say, ἵσθι τις ὁ ἄνθρωπος—ὃς οὐ μίσησιν ἀγάθων πέφνην ἢ προστασία τῆς ἡμ. ἀρχῆς (the Romans), καὶ τὸ Ῥωμαϊκὸν κράτος;—τάς τούτων χάριτας οὐδὲ μετῆσαι ἵσθι. Ἐθῆλοι δ' ἂν τις ἀκούοντες τὰς ἐντιθυίας εἶναι χάριτας οὐδὲ μαινόμενος!

—κατορθωμάτων γιν.] Lachm. and Tisch. edit διορθ., from A, B, E, and 10 cursives; to which I can make no addition; nor would it avail, since the term is not so proper as κατ.,—since it would only mean 'reforms;' too unblushing falsehood for even a Tertullus to utter; whereas κατορθ. (from κατορθώω, 'to carry any thing straight down to the end;' fig. 'to conduct an affair to a successful issue') denotes 'any affair, or course of affairs, brought to a successful issue by right management.' If it be asked, how it came to pass that so suitable a term should have been altered? I answer, from the ignorance of shallow Critics, who had learnt from peddling Grammarians, that though the verb was correct Greek (in this sense), the verbal noun was ἀδοκιμον, which was so far true, that it was not pure Attic Greek to use the verbal, as Diod., Dionys. Hal., Polyb., Plut do; for, though Thucyd. ii. 65, comes near to it, yet he only employs the Particip. κατορθούμενα, and, as here, of 'affairs rightly conducted' in legislation and government.

— διὰ τῆς σῆς προν.] Elsner well observes, that the old Romans used to ascribe national prosperity to the gods; while, in after-times, whatever happened prosperously was ascribed to the prudent counsels, προνοία, and even the τύχη, of their rulers (thus Providentia Caesaris is, as Mr. Humphrey remarks, frequently found on the coins of the emperors) without any recognition of a Divine and overruling Providence. The πάντη τε καὶ παντ, may be construed with the preceding, but best with the following words; q. d. 'in every way, and every where.'—Ἀποδεχόμεν, is a strong term, denoting 'an acceptance in full approbation.' Conf. Jos. Antt. vii. 1, 1, ἐπαίνων καὶ ἀποδεχόμενος τὸ ἔργον.

4. I have never approved of supposing an ellipsis of λεξόντων,—and I agree with Meyer, that we may take συντόμως as denoting 'the measure of the time employed in hearing.' The full sense is, 'But that I may no longer hinder thee [I will cease this preface], and I entreat thee, of thy benignity and condescension, to hear us for a short space.'—Τῇ σῇ ἐπεικείᾳ is well rendered in the Vulg. 'pro tuâ clementiâ;' since, as says Vopiscus, in Vit. Aurel. c. 44, 'clementia præcipua est principum virtus, et dos prima.' The Greek term may be rendered 'courtesy,' 'kindness.'

5. The γάρ here has the exegetical force, nampe; and in the next words there is neither ellipsis, nor use of Particip. for finite Verb; but the construction falls under the head of Anacoluthon; which, however, is removed in one MS. only—the Lamb. 1181, where I find εὐρομέν.—Λοιμὸν is not so much put for λοιμικὸν as it is used according to a frequent Greek idiom, whereby a noun in its most abstract sense is, as it were, personified, by taking the attribute inherent in the noun, and applying it to a person. Thus, then, the expression means 'a corrupter of the morals,' or, as here, 'principles of others.' This is, however, not a Hellenistic phrase (though often occurring in the Sept.), since it is found in Demosth. p. 794, 5.

6—8. The words κατὰ τὸν—ἔρχεσθαι ἐπὶ σὲ are omitted in MSS. A, B, G, H, and about 40 cursives,—with the Copt. and Sahid. Vers., and some copies of the Vulg.,—and are cancelled by Griesb., Lachm., and Tisch., though only placed in double brackets by Alf., who remarks that 'their absence from the principal MSS.; and the fact that no reason can be given for them, are strongly against their genuineness.' But we are not to be expected to always give reasons for the omission of passages; and yet Matthæi has given two reasons why the words might be removed, 1) Because the Critics believed that the Jews would never have been so imprudent, or bold, as to accuse Lysias himself. 2) Because the words παρ' οὗ, at v. 8, must be referred to Paul; though, by its position, it seems to refer to Lysias. 'Cum vero ita oratio a Paulo ad Lysiam, et rursus a Lysia ad Paulum flecteretur, ea, quæ media erant, ut temerè interposita, excluderent.' I am not disinclined to receive this mode of accounting for the removal of the words, which is what we might expect from the class of Alexandrine Critics, who at all periods took such unwarrantable liberties with the Sacred text. Thus I have shown that the omission is not, as Alf. affirms, 'unaccountable'; though for 'omission' I would say 'removal'; for omission by scribes does occur in many copies; to which I add Lamb. 1185, Mus. 1115, both of the Alexandrine family. Moreover, we may justly demand of those who cancel the words, to untie another knot far more difficult to be loosed than the former, in the two puzzles which attach to their view. For, as De Wette observes, 'it is hardly imaginable, that so little should have come from the speaker, as there would be, if these words were removed.' Besides, as Alf. grants, the Historic Aorist ἐκρατήσαμεν seems to require some sequel, some reason, after Paul's seizure, why he was there present, and freed from Jewish durance. In short, the cancelling of the words involves far greater difficulties, than the retaining of them, which I have still continued to do, as called for by the vast preponderance of external authority, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Version, also by the later Syr., and the Vulgate, except in a few copies, the two Arab. Versions, and Chrysa. Internal evidence is in favour of the words, inasmuch as no reason can be given why they should have been interpolated, but a good one why they should have been removed, since they seem to darken, by the change of subject from Paul to Lysias, and then again from Lysias to Paul, this brief and unoratorical address.

8. παρ' οὗ] I am not so sure as Matthæi, that the words must be referred to Paul; they may be meant for Lysias, and they more naturally refer to him as the nearer antecedent. However, I am strongly inclined to think οὗ is an error of the scribes for αὐ, a reading which is found in about a dozen ancient cursives, and was doubtless in the original of the MS. E. I find it also in Lamb. 1183, Mus. 16, 184, and the Cov. 3, not mentioned by Mill.

9. I have, with all the Critical Editors, received συνεπίθεντο for the text. rec. συνέθεντο, on strong authority; to which I add Lamb. 1182, 1184, 1185, Mus. 5115, 5588, Cov. 5 (omitted by Mill), and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16. Render: 'acted in concert in the attack.' So Thucyd. iii. 54, συνεπιτίθιμαιοι ἐς Λευθερίαν, and Deut. xxxii. 27. Ps. iii. 6.

10—12. In this simple, but forcible and convincing, appeal to the good sense and competent knowledge of Felix, the Apostle commences without any direct attempt to conciliate the good will of the President by any compliment, but merely contents himself with adverting to his full capability to judge respecting the matter brought before him, from his ample experience; meaning thereby to intimate that he knows the evil dispositions of the persons who are his accusers, and therefore would be less likely to be swayed by their arts. He then proceeds to refute the charge of sedition; urging that, from the President's own knowledge of the state of the province, he must be aware that such was not the case; nay, could not, since (as he was able to prove) he had but lately returned, after a long absence, to Judæa, and been only a few days at Jerusalem. Lastly, he refutes the accusation of violating the religion of his countrymen and profaning the Temple.

10. νεύσαντος [nutu significavit]. For the nature of this expression, and the similar one νεύματι χρῆσασθαι, &c., see my note on Thucyd. i. 134.

— κριτὴν] This term is used, because the Procurator held the judicial functions together with the civil and military ones.—Τὰ περὶ ἑμαντοῦ ἀπολ. Sub. πράγματα. Munthe aptly compares Diod. Sic. p. 351, τὰ καθ' ἑαυτῶν ἀπολογησάμενοι.

11. ἡμέρ. δεκαδύο] It is no easy matter to adjust the chronology of this period, however brief. See De Wette's and Meyer's arrangement, adopted by Alf.; and Wieseler's, adduced by Conybe. and Hows.; also Kuinoel's and Olshausen's. 'Non nostrum est tantas componere lites.'

13. I have double bracketed με, which almost all the Critical Editors cancel, on strong autho-

riety, which I can confirm from almost all the Lamb. and Mus. copies. I have not inserted σοι, with Lachm., since, though I find it in several Lamb. and Mus. copies, and in Trin. Coll. B, x. 16, it was evidently brought in to assist the construction.

14. ὁμολογῶ, &c.] After having refuted the charge of sedition, the Apostle proceeds to answer that of taking up and professing a religion different from that of his countrymen. This he does by showing that the doctrines he teaches are not mere novelties, but that he worships the same God with the Jews, receives the same sacred books, and has the same belief in the resurrection, both of the just and of the unjust; conformably to which, and, as a test of all true religion, he labours to preserve a conscience void of offence towards God and towards man; and accordingly he shows that he is worthy of the protection of the laws, on which he accordingly throws himself.—Αἴρεσις properly denoted only 'the taking up of an opinion,' whether well or ill founded; and sometimes it was applied to the persons who maintained the opinions. Hence many eminent Commentators here render it sect; a sense found in other passages of Luke. But the context here will scarcely permit it; and it should seem that Paul merely meant to hint at the invidious sense which the word admitted, and in which it was used by his opponents; just as in our word new-fangled, which properly denotes only what is newly taken up. That Luke and Josephus sometimes use the word in a good sense, is no proof that that was the general acceptation. Paul here simply shows what that heresy imputed to him by Tertullus really was,—namely, that it did not involve the swerving from a full belief in the Law and the Prophets.

— τῷ πατρὶ ᾧ Θεῷ is for τῷ Θεῷ τῶν πατέρων, as in v. 30. Gen. xxxii. 9, 10, and elsewhere. Of the phrase πατρὶ ᾧ Θεῷ the Commentators adduce many examples from the Class. writers. But the sense, in almost all of them, is, not the gods of any one's ancestors, but the gods worshipped at any place. So Thucyd. ii. 71, 4, conjoins θεοὺς πατρίους and ἰχθυόλους, as also does Jos. Antt. xviii. 6, 7. But that is not what is here meant, which is simply 'the one true God, that of their forefathers.' Now, as the privilege of worshipping their Θεὸν πατρίως had been secured to the Jews by many imperial charters, given at large in Josephus, where the very expression occurs; but Paul hereby throws himself under the protection of the Roman laws.

—καὶ ἐν τοῖς προφήταις] I have here thought proper to follow the Elzevir text, in preference to the Stephanic, where ἐν is not found; which, however, may be from the margin, though propriety of language will scarcely dispense with it. It is in the MS. B, and many Lamb. and Mus. copies. Many MSS., including several Lamb. and Mus. copies, however, have also τοῖς before ἐν; which was received into their texts by Griesb. and Scholz. But it has every appearance of being from the margin. Perhaps Luke wrote κάν for καὶ ἐν, a frequent Crasis, and thus the ἐν might easily be lost. Alf. thinks ἐν brought in 'to ease the construction'; but that is only one of the vast multitude of hypotheses broached to 'ease' himself of the trouble of that profound inquiry, which would go far to extinguish the hypotheses.

15. δικαίων τε καὶ ἀδίκων] Such, indeed, was the general opinion of the Pharisees, though some of them believed only in a resurrection of the just. The opinion, however, was novel, and by no means universal.

16. ἐν τούτῳ δὲ αὐτὸς ἀσκάω] Neuter for Middl. refl. ἀσκάομαι. A very rare idiom, of which the only other examples I know of are the following: Polybius, ix. 20, ὁ περὶ τὰς βασιλείων τήχας ἀκούωντες. Xen. Mag. Eq. viii. 5, οἱ εἰς τοὺς γυμνακοὺς ἀγῶνας ἀκούοντες. The ἐν with dat. in St. Luke is eq. to eis and acc. in Polyb., and this very rare use occurs in Arrian, Epict. ii. 16, ἡσυχίας (sc. σπαντὸν) ἐν ταῖς ἀποκρίσεσιν. Comp. Ps. cxxxi. 1. In all the three passages there is a use of Neuter for Mid. reflex., the pronoun ἑαυτὸν being understood; which is expressed in Lucian, t. i. 564, ἑμαυτὸν μὲν δασκᾷ εἶναι περιεκτικόν.

—ἀπρόσκ. συνείδ. ἔχειν] 'to have and keep.' See note on 1 Pet. ii. 12.

17. Here the Apostle replies to the third point of accusation, profanation of the Temple.

—δι' ἐτῶν πλείονων] 'after very many years'; of which sense of διά, see other examples in my Lex.

—καὶ προσφοράς] scil. ποιήσων, 'ut sacra facerem'; προσφ. being used for θυσίας, as at xxi. 26, and Eph. v. 2. It should seem that money was sent by the foreign Jewish Christians to those in Judæa, in imitation of the custom of the foreign Jews, to send presents, &c. to the Temple at Jerusalem; and which probably had been more or less done, even as far back as the first kings of the Asmonæan dynasty. Josephus often notices it, especially at Ant. xvi. 2, 4, χρήματα δὲ τῷ Θεῷ συμφέρομεν (contribute) ἱπώνυμα, 'called by a correspondent name,' meaning, 'the treasury of God,' Corbana.

By this the Apostle means to show that, as his purpose was one both of charity and piety, it was surely most improbable that he should have been guilty of profanation of the Temple.

18. ἐν οἷς] scil. πράγμασι: meaning, 'in the discharge of which office,' as infra xvi. 12. The reading of some MSS., ἐν αἷς, is evidently an alteration, to accommodate the expression to grammatical accuracy, and, as Alf. says, to suit προσφοράς, though uncritically received by Scholz, Lachm., and Tisch. Alf. rightly rejects the reading, and adopts my interpretation.

At εὐρόν με ἡγνισμ. ἐν τ. i. there is an anacoluthon by the omission of some subject to εὐρόν, left to be supplied from the context,—namely, as Meyer and Alf. say, some Nominat. case, implied in οὐ μετὰ ὄχλου. οὐ μ. θορ., which Bornem. would supply by οὐχ οὗτοι μὲν, to correspond to τινὲς δέ: but that would involve an irregularity wholly unprecedented. Accordingly, the former, as the lesser of the two hardships, is to be preferred. As to the formula respecting the use of δέ, adduced by Alf.,—Hermann on Viger. p. 702, 19, where he remarks, 'intelligitur in hac formula quam malum, stultum est, vel simile quid.' But the question is, whether Hermann's Canon, as to this formula, supposing it to be well founded, here applies; espec. since the genuineness of the δέ is questionable. My own collations discountenance it, for, of the Lamb., Mus., and Trin. Coll. copies, I find only one which has it,—Lamb. 1182: but internal evidence is rather against it; for it should seem that the scribes, or some half-learned Critics, thought, as, indeed, did Griesb. and Scholz, that the sentence terminated at θορύβου, and, feeling that some connective particle was wanting at τινὲς, supplied δέ. No wonder, since in sentences of difficult construction such particles as δέ, &c. are often introduced through misapprehension; and sometimes new verbs have been brought in to complete an imperfect construction. Whether this applies here I am not prepared to say. It should seem that, through some cause or other, there is no construction at all, but a sort of cul de sac. Now, could we depend on the reading δέ, and the right application of Hermann's Canon as to this idiom in the use of δέ, we might, with Con. and Hows., p. 293, express the sense of the passage thus:—'And they found me so doing in the Temple, after I had undergone purification; not gathering together a multitude, nor causing a tumult; but certain Jews from Asia discovered me, who ought to have been here before thee to accuse me, if they had any thing to object against me.'

19. εἰδῇ] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read δεῖ, which is found in A, C, D, and 40 cursives; to which I add Lamb. 1181, 1182, 1184, 1185, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16; and internal evidence is in its favour, δεῖ being perhaps altered to suit ἔχουσιν. = ἔχουσι.

20, 21. Render: 'or else, let these persons themselves here present say (if they can) what offence they found in me when I stood before the Sanhedrim:—other than in respect of this one saying,—which I uttered aloud, while I stood among them.' Tl is, as I have already explained, for τὶ ἄλλο, —a common ellipsis, when ἡ follows. In περὶ μιᾶς ταύτης φωνῆς there is, as Beza remarks, a delicate irony, like that at 2 Cor. xii. 13, εἰ μὴ ὅτι αὐτὸς ἐγὼ οὐ κατενόηκα ὑμῶν; q. d. 'except for this one speech [if they can make an offence of that].'

21. For ἔκραξα, MSS. A, C, and 20 cursives (with 3 Lamb. and 2 Mus. MSS.), have ἐκίκραξα, which is adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; and internal evidence may seem in its favour;—but only seems, for I cannot find the least proof that this form, as if formed from κακράγω, ever existed; and it would seem to be a mere barbarism, introduced by careless scribes from the dregs infima Græcilitas, or else originating in a mere slip of the pen.

For ὑφ' ὑμῶν. Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ἐφ' ὑμῶν, from A, B, C, and 6 cursives; to which I add Lamb. 1181, 1184, 1185, and Cov. 4, omitted by Mill; also the Leicester MS. omitted by Wets.; and no doubt it is in several other MSS. unnoticed by the collators. That the Pesch. Syr. Translator had it in his copy is plain.

22. ἀνεβάλετο αὐτοὺς] 'ampliavit illos,' put off the decision of their cause. 'Ἀναβ. signifies to defer a thing (ava) to another time, as ἀνατίθαι τὸ ἔργον. It has almost always an Accus. of the thing; sometimes, however, of the person, when the business is not our own, but another's; in which case we may be said figuratively to put him off. So the word is used in Plutarch, Op., vol. i. 738, Xyl., ἀναβαλίσθαι τὴν σύγκλητον, also in Dio Cass. 70, 40, εἰς ἑταρον σφᾶς σύλλογον ἀνεβάλλοντο, and 433, 41. ταῖς ψευδολογίαις, αἰς ἀναβαλλοῦσιν ἡμᾶς.

—ἀκριβ. εἰδὼς—ὁδοῦ] I am not satisfied with any one of the many ways in which these words (simple as they seem) have been explained by various interpreters, who only 'darken knowledge.' The simplest interpretation is, 'having a competent knowledge about the way'—the religion of the defendant.' So that he required no further information on the trial; inasmuch that it was only needful to wait for the coming of Lysias before he finally decided the cause. So the Pesch. Syr. seems to have understood the words. That Felix had a pretty exact information about the Christian religion is very probable; for, as Conyb. observes, 'besides other means of information, during the years he had been governor in a country where he had been resident for many years, his present wife Drusilla was a Jewess.'

—διαγνώσομαι τ. κ. ὅ.] lit. 'I will thoroughly (finally) decide the matters respecting you.' As to the text of the verse, 5 uncials, and several cursives, omit ἀκούσας δὲ ταῦτα, and Alf. pronounces the text rec. 'a correction for particularity;' he might have added, 'and distinctness.' But the reading needs more evidence in cursives, which I cannot supply. However, since it is strongly supported by the Versions, it is probably, but not certainly, the true reading.

23. διαταξ. τε] The τε is omitted in A, B, C, E, and about 10 cursives (to which I add Lamb. 1183, 1184), and some Versions, —not the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg.,—and is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. If this be the true text (which it may well be), διαταξ. is in apposition with εἰπὼν, and both belong to ἀνεβάλετο. At this rate the composition of the verse is quite Thucydidean in brevity, compactness, and management of the Participles. Whether the ancient Emendators imparted this Classic tournerie is more than I would assert; but the text rec. is more in the Scriptural style. As to the αὐτὸν for Παῦλον, from the same uncials, 10 cursives (to which I add Lamb. 1184, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16), and some Vers., not the Pesch. Syr. (as Alf.), and adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., and the words ἢ προσέρχεσθαι after ὀνησται, expunged by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., on the authority of the same uncials, but only five cursives;—those readings come under the same category, and only confirm my suspicion; for the words ἢ προσέρχεσθαι were far more likely to be removed by fastidious Critics as unnecessary, than introduced by the Revisers. As to the cursives here they are all of the same family as the uncials. As to the Versions alleged against the words, —Versions are not in a case like this of any great weight. Besides, the most important —as the Pesch. Syr.—ought not to come into count, since, in a very similar passage, supra x. 28, κολλᾶσθαι ἢ προσέρχεσθαι, it passes over the word προσ. as unnecessary, though it is found in every copy, except one *Lectio*ary, and all the other Versions.

As to the words τηρεῖσθαι—ἔχειν τε ἄνεσιν, ἔχειν ἄνεσιν may be meant to qualify τηρεῖσθαι; and the sense seems to be, 'He ordered him to be held in safe keeping, and yet to enjoy some relaxation [of confinement]';—namely, as some Commentators think, by being kept in φυλακῇ ἀδόσμῳ. Yet that is irreconcilable with xxvi. 25, and perhaps inconsistent with the due security of his person, as his friends were allowed to visit him. It should rather seem that what is meant by the ἄνεσις is the changing of the close custody of a prison into the milder durance of the custodia militaris; on which see note supra xxii. 29. Of the phrase ἔχειν ἄνεσιν in this sense an example is cited by Loesner from Philo, p. 605. In the same light, I would observe, the passage was evidently viewed by the Pesh. Syr. Translator, who closely connects these words with the preceding. His version, as expressed in the Latin of Schaaf, being, 'Præcepit Centurioni ut servarent Paulum in quiete.' Rather, 'præcepit Centurioni ut custodiret Paulum cum laxitate;' for { } may very well bear that sense, since its feminine form { } has it at Eph. iv. 2.

Col. iii. 12, and 2 Cor. x. 1. As to { } in this sense, that is almost its perpetual use. Thus far in my former Editions. I now am enabled to add, that my view of the nature of the confinement is confirmed by the suffrage of Wieseler, Chron., p. 380. He first shows what the libera custodia was, and what it was not; and he then proves that Paul's confinement could not be the latter, but that it was the custodia militaris, which allowed of some relaxation in certain cases; as he proves from Jos. Antt. xviii. 6, 11, φυλακὴ μὲν γὰρ καὶ τήρησις ἦν μετὰ μίτροι ἀνίστασθαι τῆς εἰς τὴν διαίταν. The words καὶ μηδένα—αὐτῷ are not meant to explain the preceding ἄνεσιν ἔχειν, but to add another privilege,—which did not belong to the custodia militaris, and solely appertained to the custodia libera. By τῶν ἰδίων here are meant not merely Paul's relations, friends, and acquaintances, but persons who had occasion to resort to him. Thus Paul had, we see, free intercourse with persons from all quarters, in every part of Judæa or Syria. And hence, during the two years that Paul resided at Cæsarea (ver. 27) under these favourable circumstances for general usefulness to the Christian world, it cannot, Canon Tate thinks, be doubted but that the Apostle's evangelical zeal found a range of constant activity in the care of all the Churches. I am, however, not sure that this is not an exaggerated statement. Our information as to the Apostle's actual circumstances is not such as to enable us to know the full extent of his power of general usefulness;—how much his evangelical zeal might be able to effect, or to what extent 'the care of all the Churches' could still be said to be resting on him. My own impression is that of Olshausen, and, in a great measure, of Conyb.,—that during those two years there was, by a mysterious dispensation of Almighty Providence, carrying on an important inner work, in this chosen Instrument for effecting great purposes. And as Paul might need the repose of preparation in Arabia, before he entered on his great career, so the two years of even prison seclusion at its middle might be beneficial to the purposes of inward recollection and quiet meditation, and less interrupted prayer, than in the previous scenes of active life; which would doubtless result in a deeper personal experience of the power of the Gospel;—thus enabling him to be far more than heretofore occupied with his own state, and thus producing a blessed inward development. In short, there can be little doubt that what Patmos was to St. John, the prison at Cæsarea was to St. Paul, and, we may add, the Castle of Wartenberg to Luther. Though in the first and the last of these cases Divine Providence was pleased to unite with the personal, and, so far, main purpose, another and public one for the benefit of the Church Universal of every age,—in the one case the sending forth the Apocalypse, in the other, the translation of the Scriptures into the vernacular tongue.

24. παραγενόμενος] 'having repaired to, arrived.' It is not said where, but doubtless to some apartment suitable for giving audience; probably the ἀκροατήριον mentioned infra xx. 23, where Paul afterwards spake before Festus.

—αὐτοῦ] This word, not found in several MSS. and Theophylact, has been cancelled by Griesb. and others; perhaps rightly; for in several MSS. Idia is read, and in some both Idia and αὐτοῦ. Thus there is some reason to suspect both of them to be from the margin. I find them not in several Mus. copies. The words οὔσῃ Ἰουδαία seem meant to suggest the reason why Felix brought Drusilla with him. She, being a Jewess, would be likely to take some interest in the question as to the truth of the Christian religion; and would be anxious to see Paul, and to hear what he had to say. By ἤκουσεν αὐτοῦ περὶ is simply meant, 'heard what he had to say concerning.' By τῆς εἰς Χριστὸν πίστεως is here meant 'the Christian religion'; of which faith in Christ is the distinguishing characteristic.

25. διαλεγόμενου αὐτοῦ, &c.] Render: 'as he discoursed.' By δικαιοσύνη is meant righteousness not merely external, but internal, when the heart is right towards God by a holy obedience to his will. By ἐγκράτεια is meant not temperance only, a mastery over the appetites and passions, but continence, or chastity. A very rare sense, of which only two examples have been adduced, Xen. Ag. v. 4, περὶ τῶν ἀφροδισίων ἡγκρατίας αὐτοῦ. Jos. Antt. xv. 7, 6, γυνὴ πρὸς ἡγκράτιαν ἀρίστα γειννημένη, ὀπίπῃ comparata. These two duties seem to have been specified, because in them Felix was notoriously deficient; and in the latter Drusilla, a most profligate princess, yet who might have some curiosity to know what could be said for that form of Faith, which professed to be founded on the fulfilment of Jewish prophecy. The topics were well suited to the persons addressed; and, considering their evil life, the third particular was well adapted to smite their conscience, and rouse them to repentance; especially since the doctrine of a future judgment must have been well known to Drusilla; nay, the use of the Article alludes to its notoriety.

— ἔμφοβος γενόμενος] In tracing the nature and extent of this feeling, it is well to avoid the two extremes, either on the one hand of supposing Felix's feeling to have been that of trembling terror, or on the other (with most of the recent foreign Commentators), simply an uneasy feeling. For the former view there is no warrant in the phraseology; since, though the words ἔμφοβος and ἐντρομος are combined in Heb. xii. 21, yet ἐντρομος is a stronger term than ἔμφοβος (and therefore consorting with ἔμφοβος), which is merely an adjective formed on the phrase ἐν φόβῳ εἶναι. And as little is to be found in the context for the latter; since, considering the subject (which could not fail to embrace the performance of the moral duties in their leading branches) of righteousness and temperance, to fit us for the mercy of God in Christ, he could not fail to have been conscience-struck, and for the time alarmed; but there was, as appears from the result, no such 'godly fear as worketh repentance.'—τὸ νῦν ἔχον πορεύουν was, as Conybeare observes, 'the response of the conscience-stricken, but impatient sinner, the response which the Divine Word has received ever since, when listened to in a like spirit.' These unpalatable truths, then, Felix puts off, on the principle suggested by Horace, Epist. i. 2, 39, 'Nam cur Quam lædunt oculum festinas demere, si quid Est (for edū) animum, differt curandi tempus in annum?'

— τὸ νῦν ἔχον] 'for the present.' So Max. Tyr. Diss. xxii. 3, ἀλλ' ἐπισχέιν τὸ νῦν ἔχον.—Καιρὸν μεταλαβὼν is regarded as a Hellenistic phrase, for καιρὸν λαβὼν, or καιροῦ μεταλ. Yet one example has been adduced from Polyb. ii. 16, μεταλαβόντες καιρὸν ἀρμόττοντα.

two causes which induced Felix to give Paul his dismissal: 1. because he felt apprehension; and 2. because it was his policy to dismiss him, and send for him again and again, in order to get a bribe to set him at liberty; for it appears from Joseph. Antt. xx. 8, 5, and Bell. ii. 14, 1, that corruption of this kind was then common; and Felix might suppose that as Paul was one of the leaders of a sect disposed to collect money for any pious and charitable purpose, a considerable sum might be raised to obtain his release. This I find confirmed by a remark of Mr. Birks, that Felix, well knowing how the Christians aided one another in distress; and, possibly, having some information of the funds which St. Paul had recently been entrusted with, might suppose he had a good opportunity of enriching himself. The δὲ is omitted in A, B, C, E, G, H, and 50 cursives; to which I add all the Lamb. MSS. but one, and some Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16, and Cov. 2, omitted by Mill. Yet it was more likely to be omitted as unnecessary, than inserted. It often occurs in the Class. writers, and frequently in the New Test., e. gr. Matt. iii. 10. xviii. 17. xxvii. 41. Mark xiv. 31. xv. 40. Luke iii. 9. v. 10. vi. 15. x. 32. xi. 18. xii. 54. xiv. 12, 26. xvi. 1, 22. xviii. 9. xix. 18. xx. 11, 12, 31. xxi. 16. xxii. 24. xxiii. 32, 33, 55. John ii. 2. iii. 23. xviii. 2, 5. xix. 19, 39. xxi. 25. Acts ii. 26. viii. 13. xi. 12. xii. 9, 14. xiii. 5. xix. 31. xxi. 16. xxii. 28. xxiv. 9. 1 Cor. iv. 7. vii. 3, 11, 25, 28, 37, 40. xiv. 15. xv. 6, 14, 15. 2 Cor. iv. 3. x. 15. xi. 6. xii. 9. xiii. 6. Gal. ii. 20. iii. 26. Eph. iv. 15. v. 11. Phil. iii. 18. iv. 15. 1 Thess. v. 21. 2 Tim. ii. 5. Philem. ix. 22, et al. ssp. In most, however, of the passages, some MSS. more or less Alexandrian, almost always omit the δὲ.

— ὅλ· χάριτας καταθέσθαι] It was, as we find from Jos. Antt. x. 9, 4, usual for Roman governors to confer some favours upon the people on vacating their post; and one of these was a general gaoi-delivery; probably accorded here, —but from the benefit of which Paul was, it seems, excluded, that a greater favour might be done to the Jews. This Felix could do by holding the matter in abeyance, —neither condemning nor acquitting the prisoner; this, therefore, was a signal favour to the Jews. But then why have we the plural χάριτας? So thought the ancient Critics, who, as we find from MSS. A, B, C, and not a few cursives (to which I add Lamb. 1183, 1184, 1185, and Cov. 4, omitted by Mill), emended χάριτα, which was received by Lachm., and by Tisch., who, however, in his 2nd Edit.

XXV. ¹ Φῆστος οὖν ἐπιβὰς τῇ ἐπαρχίᾳ, μετὰ τρεῖς ἡμέρας ἀνέβη εἰς Ἱεροσόλυμα ἀπὸ Καισαρείας. ² Ἐνεφάνισαν δὲ αὐτῷ ὁ ἀρχιερεὺς καὶ οἱ πρῶτοι τῶν Ἰουδαίων κατὰ τοῦ Παύλου, καὶ παρεκάλουν αὐτὸν, ³ αἰτούμενοι χάριν κατ' αὐτοῦ, ὅπως μεταπέμψῃται αὐτὸν εἰς Ἱερουσαλὴμ, ⁴ ἐνέδραν ποιοῦντες ἀνελεῖν αὐτὸν κατὰ τὴν ὁδόν. ⁵ Ὁ μὲν οὖν Φῆστος ἀπεκρίθη, τηρεῖσθαι τὸν Παῦλον ἐν Καισαρείᾳ, ἑαυτὸν δὲ μέλλειν ἐν τάχει ἐκπορεύεσθαι. ⁶ Οἱ οὖν δυνατοὶ ἐν ὑμῖν, φησὶ, συγκαταβάντες, εἴ τι ἐστὶν ἐν τῷ ἀνδρὶ τούτῳ, κατηγορεῖτωσαν αὐτοῦ. ⁶ Διαrestored χάριτας, which is retained by Alf.; rightly; since the plural is the more difficult reading, and is supported by all the MSS. except 20; and is justified by the fact, that this criminal indulgence was one among others which Felix conferred upon the Jews. The effect of this crooked and base policy was, as might be expected, insufficient to answer the purpose intended, and too base to deserve any return at all; nay, the Jews did, just the same, pursue him at Rome with their accusations; and he was only preserved from capital punishment by the influence of his brother Pallas, the Emperor Nero's favourite.

XXV. 1. ἐπιβὰς τῇ ἐπαρχίᾳ] Render: 'after entering upon his province.' Ἐπαρχία was the name properly applied to the larger provinces, to which were sent Propraetors or Proconsuls, according as they were Imperial or Senatorial; while the smaller ones were termed ἑπιτροπαί, and their Governors ἐπιτροποι, Procuratores, as being attached to the Provinces to which they belonged. These, indeed, were often little more than collectors of the revenues; though in many instances they exercised the judicial functions, as was the case in most of those held by the ἐπαρχοί. Now Judaea, from particular circumstances, was one of these. Hence it might be called ἐπαρχία; and so Josephus sometimes styles the Governor ἐπαρχος. See Ant. xx. 8, 11, and 9, 1. However, in these passages, and in the one before us, it is only a loose, and probably a provincial designation.

— μετὰ τρεῖς ἡμέρας] Why Festus went so soon to Jerusalem was, as Conyb. observes, because, 'as his first object would naturally be, to make himself acquainted with the feelings of the people, and to visit such places as were associated with national interests,' he would be sure to lose no time to go to a place which to the Jews was all in all. And here the unrelenting hatred of the Jews made a fresh attempt on Paul's life; and the course of their proceedings changed at once the whole aspect of his case, and led to unexpected results.

2. παρεκάλουν α.] 'Entreated him,' 'instantly precibus,' 'besought him with entreaties.' So Job xxix. 16, 'I called my servant, and he gave me no answer. I entreated him with my mouth.'

3. αἰτούμενοι χάριν is a brief form of expression for αἰτούμενοι χάριν ἐν ὁκρῇ τῇ κατ'

αὐτοῦ. Comp. ver. 15, 'asked the κατ' α. δίκ. as a favour.'

— ἐνέδραν ποιοῦντες] There is no need to take, as many Expositors do, the Present for Future, but we may regard the Present as used of intention and purpose as to future action; as in very many passages both of Script. and Class. writers; e. gr. John x. 32, ληθάξεται; and ἐνέδραν π. is put for ἐνεδρεύοντες (for one is as good as the other), but is used the better to intimate 'intention'; otherwise καθίζοντες would have been more appropriate. Κατὰ τὴν ὁδόν, though placed just after ἀνελθῶν, ought not to be construed with it, but with the preceding ἐνέδραν ποιοῦντες,—the words κατὰ τὴν ὁδόν denoting the place of the ambush, as in Thucyd. iv. 67, and often in the best Class. writers, and in Sept. The sense is better rendered in our Common Version by 'laying wait,' than in Pearce, Newc., and Wakef., 'lying in wait.' But Tyndale best of all, 'layd awayte.' Read 'a wayte,' i. e. 'a watch' or 'ambush.' Wyclif, 'layd espies in the way.' Paul's deadly foes would have no difficulty in procuring persons to lie in ambush to make away with him, since, as we have learnt from Jos. Ant. xx., the country then swarmed with σικάριοι, who, as I have shown supra xxi. 38, were in all cases ready to act as assassins, and were hired for that purpose by individuals, or by political parties.

4. ἀπεκρίθη, τηρεῖσθαι] These words cannot, on account of the following clause, bear any other sense than this, 'He answered that Paul was in confinement at Caesarea;' intimating that where his place of confinement was, and where the residence of the Procurator was, there his trial ought to be.

5. οἱ δυνατοὶ] meaning, 'the persons of consequence among you,' equiv. to the οἱ πρῶτοι just before spoken of; a use of the word occurring not only in Philo and Jos., but also in Thucyd.; e. gr. ii. 65. iii. 27, 47. viii. 63.

6. There is here a great variety of readings. The text. rec. has ἡμέραν πλείονα ἢ δίκην, which is liable to objection; and Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ἡμ. οὐ πλ. ὁκρῶ ἢ δίκην, from A, B, C, E, and 20 cursives; to which I can only add 2 Lamb. MSS. But there is no proof that the ancients used such an idiom as that of what was past and certain. As far as regards the insertion of ὁκρῶ, I suspect that reading, adopted by all our Critical Editors, except Matthæi, is merely a compound

τρίψας δὲ ἐν αὐτοῖς ἡμέρας οὐ πλείους ὁκτώ [ἢ δέκα], καταβὰς εἰς Καισάρειαν, τῇ ἐπαύριον καθίσας ἐπὶ τοῦ βήματος, ἐκέλευσε τὸν Παῦλον ἀχθῆναι. ⁷ Παραγενομένου δὲ αὐτοῦ, περιέστησαν οἱ ἀπὸ Ἱεροσολύμων καταβεβηκότες Ἰουδαῖοι, πολλὰ καὶ βαρέα * αἰτιώματα φέροντες κατὰ τοῦ Παύλου, ἃ οὐκ ἴσχυον ὑποδείξαι. ⁸ ὁ ἀπολογουμένου αὐτοῦ "Οτι οὔτε εἰς τὸν νόμον τῶν Ἰουδαίων, ^{b ch. 24. 12.} οὔτε εἰς τὸ ἱερὸν, οὔτε εἰς Καίσαρα τι ἡμαρτον. ^{ch. 25. 17.} ⁹ Ὁ Φῆστος δὲ, τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις θέλων χάριν καταθέσθαι, ἀποκριθεὶς τῷ Παύλῳ εἶπε· Θέλεις εἰς Ἱεροσόλυμα ἀναβὰς, ἐκεῖ περὶ τούτων κρίνεσθαι ἐπ' ἐμοῦ; ¹⁰ Εἶπε δὲ ὁ Παῦλος· Ἐπὶ τοῦ βήματος Καίσαρος ἔστω εἰμι, οὐ με δεῖ κρίνεσθαι. Ἰουδαίους οὐδὲν of two readings, each found in the MSS., of which δέκα is the best supported; but ὁκτώ has considerable authority. The mistake might arise from uacism, which would produce a var. lect. upon ἡ' (8), namely, ε' (10). If, however, the first mentioned objection to the reading in question could be removed, I would receive it; for in οὐ πλείους ἡ' ἢ ε', one ἡ' might easily absorb the other. As to the οὐ, there is no inconsiderable authority for it; and internal evidence is in its favour; so that I have sometimes observed it lost before πλείους. Accordingly I have admitted it into my text, and also the ὁκτώ; and I have bracketed the ἡ δέκα, since it is uncertain whether ὁκτώ or δέκα was the original reading, which I would not presume to say with certainty; but prob. ὁκτώ, and then the ἡ may have originated in a scholium.

7. περίστησαν οἱ, &c. There is in the air of this term something graphic; and, to complete the picture, the ancient Critics,—as we find from A, B, C, E, and many cursives of the same family, also 2 Lamb. and 3 Mus. copies,—thought fit to add αὐτοῦ, or αὐτόν, adopted by Lachm. and Tisch., ed. 1, but rejected by Tisch., ed. 2, and by Alf., who pronounces the reading "an interpolation for perspicuity;" for, he says, it must mean 'round Paul.'—as is plain from the αὐτοῦ, not 'round the βῆμα, nor Festus.' But the αὐτοῦ will not prove that the word is to be referred to Paul. It was not, I apprehend, meant to be referred to any person, but only to the place, or the βῆμα, as our Translators thought; and thus there is more of gravity and dignity.

For text. rec. αἰτιάματα, almost all the uncials, and very many cursives (to which, however, I can only add 2 Lamb. and 2 or 3 Mus. copies), have αἰτιώματα, which is received by all the Editors from Griesbach downwards, in deference to whose judgment I have admitted it into my text; though I have never yet been able to find a single example of the existence of the word elsewhere. If, however, it be genuine, it must have been a form of the ordinary or Provincial Greek, not preserved to us in the Class. writers.

8. ὅτι οὐτα εἰς—ἡμαρτον Here we have simply a denial of the charges that had been lately made against the Apostle by the Asiatic Jews, supra xxi. 28, κατὰ τοῦ λαοῦ καὶ τοῦ νόμου καὶ τοῦ τόπου τούτου [ἱεροῦ]. With respect to εἰς Καισάρια, that is meant to deny the charge made by the high priest and elders, supra xxiv. 5, where they represent Paul as κινουῦντα στάσις τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις,—namely, by declaring Jesus to be the only true King of the Jews; which assertion was supposed to be derogatory to the claims of Cæsar to their allegiance. Comp. John xix. 12, πᾶς ὁ βασιλεὺς αὐτὸν ποιῶν ἀντιλέγει τῷ Καίσαρι, where see note.

9. For κρίνεσθαι, A, B, C, E, and 7 cursives, have κριθῆναι, which is edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; while Matth., Griesb., and Scholz, retain κρίν., rightly; for though Alf. pronounces it a 'correction,' that is rather true of κριθ., which evidently came from the Alexandrine Critics; since it is better Greek, and has more of strict propriety, as referring to the final decision of the accusations by judgment; but the other is more agreeable to the plain style of the Scriptures; and yet it was not likely to be introduced into all the copies but eleven.

—ἐν' ἐμοῦ 'me proside.' For the sentence of the Sanhedrim would have to be confirmed by the fiat of the President, who had courts both at Cæsarea and Jerusalem.

It is not likely that Festus knew any thing of the intended assassination of Paul, on the road between Cæsarea and Jerusalem. He might say what he did, partly to gratify the Jews (who, he saw, were so earnestly desirous to get Paul to Jerusalem), and partly because he was at a loss, as he pretended (ver. 20), how to proceed in the case, and was willing to shift the matter from himself; otherwise he could not but know that a person who was innocent at Cæsarea could not be found guilty at Jerusalem; and he plainly saw that Paul was innocent. Why, then, did he not acquit him? Because he durst not disoblige the Jews. But Paul was so well acquainted with their temper, that he chose to trust himself to Heathens rather than to those of his own religion; and he had reason to suspect that Festus would give him up, rather than incur the displeasure of the Jews; so that his safest way was to appeal to the Emperor, as a Roman citizen.

10. τοῦ βήματος K.] 'Cæsar's Court;' for it might be so called, as being held by the President on the authority of Cæsar, and in his name. At με δεῖ κρίνεσθαι there is an ellipse of μόνον, alluding to what he well knew was their design, to have him tried by the Sanhedrim, subject to the President's confirmation, who, he hints by the words further on, οὐδεὶς με δύναται αὐτοῖς χαρτῶσθαι, would give him up to their fury (see note on ver. 16).

11. For γάρ, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read οὖν, from A, B, C, E, and 15 cursives (I add Lamb. 1185, and Cov. 4, omitted by Mill); but without reason; for external authority, as well as internal evidence, is against the reading, which arose, I suspect, from misunderstanding the γάρ, by not perceiving its reference to something not expressed in the context. However, the matter of internal evidence here is (as often) one of doubtful disputation; and Meyer and De Wette are at issue. Under such circumstances, and considering the great preponderance of external evidence for the text. rec., there is no reason to alter it.

— οὐδαίς με δύναται α. χαρ.] meaning, 'give up for trial;' which was equiv. to condemnation and death. So infra ver. 16, χαρίζεσθαι εἰς ἀπώλειαν, — a sense of the word, I believe, unexampled in the Class. writers. This conveys a delicate reproof to Festus for wishing to do a favour to the Jews at his expense, and is meant to hint that he has not the power, i. e. as Grotius explains, salvo jure; δύναται referring to lawful right.

— Καίσαρα ἐπικ.] This was, as Conyb. observes, the regular technical phrase for 'lodging an appeal,' which was not, by the Roman law, necessary to be in writing, and delivered to the Court, but the pronunciation of the single word Appello was sufficient to suspend all further proceedings.

12. τοῦ συμβουλίου] meaning those persons (termed at v. 23, οἱ κατ' ἐξοχὴν ὄντες τῆς πόλεως, doubtless the principal officers, military and civil) who were of counsel with him, both in the administration of the government of the province, and were also assessors, or associates, on the bench of justice. I have, on due consideration, adopted, with Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., the comma after ἐπικέκλησαι, instead of the mark of interrogation, according to which there was indeed more point and spirit; but in the declarative mode, more of judicial propriety; q. d. 'So then thou hast appealed unto Cæsar: unto Cæsar, then, thou shalt be sent.'

14. ἀνέθετο τὰ κατὰ τ. Π.] 'related the circumstances of Paul's case,' thus referring it to his better judgment. So Diog. Laert. ii. 18, 6, ἀκούσας πρὸς σε ἀνατεθῆναι περὶ ἡμῶν.

15. δίκην] for καταδίκην, 'judgment,' i. e. condemnation and punishment, as in 2 Thess. i. 9.

16. πρὸς οὓς ἀπεκ.] 'to whom I made answer.' This construction is rare, but occurs at Luke vi. 3.

— χαρίζεσθαι τινα ἄνδρ. εἰς ἀπώλ.] A brief mode of expression, meaning 'to give up any one to condemnation and destruction (i. e. capital punishment) out of favour to another.' So Seneca says, 'damnare aliquem gratiâ,' scil. 'alicujus,' and ἀπώλεια is so used in Hist. of Bel and Dr. v. 41, τοὺς δὲ αἰτίους τῆς ἀπωλείας. — Κατὰ πρόσωπον is for πρόσωπον πρὸς πρόσωπον. The sense of τόπον ἀπολογίας λάβοι is, 'and shall have opportunity of exculpating himself.' This sense of τόπος indeed often occurs with δίδουσι, but very rarely with λαμβάνειν. The most apposite example adduced is from Jos. Antt. xvi. 8, ἀπολογουμένοι τόπον λαμβάνειν. I have now placed the words εἰς ἀπώλ. in brackets. They are cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., on considerable authority, but scarcely competent, though confirmed by internal evidence.

17. ἀναβολὴν μ. ποιησάμενος] 'making no delay.' A purely Classical phrase. So Thucyd. ii. 42, 4, ἀναβολὴν τοῦ δεινοῦ ποιεῖσάτο.

18. περὶ οὗ] scil. πράγματος.—σταθ., 'being set up (to speak)' concerning the charge previously advanced in the cause.—For ἐπιφέρειν, [ἐπ]έφερον ὡν ὑπενόουν ἐγώ¹⁹ ἡ ζητήματα δέ τινα περὶ τῆς ἑ ch. 18. 18. ἰδίας δεισιδαιμονίας εἶχον πρὸς αὐτὸν, καὶ περὶ τινος Ἰησοῦ τεθνηκότος, ὃν ἔφασκεν ὁ Παῦλος ζῆν. ²⁰ Ἀπορούμενος δὲ ἐγὼ εἰς τὴν περὶ † τούτου ζήτησιν, ἔλεγον, εἰ βούλουτο πορεύεσθαι εἰς † Ἱερουσαλὴμ, κἀκεῖ κρίνεσθαι περὶ τούτων. ²¹ Τοῦ δὲ Παύλου ἐπικαλεσαμένου τηρηθῆναι αὐτὸν εἰς τὴν τοῦ Σεβαστοῦ διάγνωσιν, ἐκέλευσα τηρεῖσθαι αὐτὸν, ἕως οὗ † πέμψω αὐτὸν πρὸς Καίσαρα. ²² Ἀγρίππας δὲ πρὸς τὸν Φῆστον ἔφη· Ἐβουλόμην καὶ αὐτὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἀκοῦσαι. ὁ δὲ Αὔριον, φησὶν, ἀκούσῃ αὐτοῦ.

Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ἔφερον, from A, B, C, E, G, and about 12 cursives; to which I can only add Lamb. 1184, and 1 Mus. MS., and Cov. 4, passed over by Mill. However, internal evidence may seem rather against the ἐπι; but it is a matter of such doubtful disputation, that the Preposition ought not to be expunged without stronger authority. See on v. 21.

19. δεισιδαιμονίας here denotes not superstition, but, as the best Commentators have been long agreed, religion; of course in a middle sense; as Jos. Bell. ii. 9, 3, ὑπερβαύσας τὸ τῆς δεισιδαιμονίας ἄκρατον, and sometimes in the Class. writers.

— περὶ τινος Ἰησοῦ τεθνῶ.] This is not well rendered, 'of one Jesus who was dead' (for that would require the Article τοῦ); rather, 'about a certain person deceased, called Jesus.' So the Pesch. Syr. Version.

20. ἀπορούμενος δὲ ἐγὼ, &c.] The τούτου some refer to the question as to Jesus and his resurrection; but it is better, by an ellipsis of πράγματος, to understand it of the whole matter in debate, the religion itself. The general sense being, 'was at a loss how to deal with a matter of that sort; τούτου being, as often, used for τοιούτου, as Jerome took it. It is true that 5 uncials, and 20 cursives (to which I add Lamb. 1182, 1184, Mus. 5115, 16, 184, and Cov. 2, omitted by Mill, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16), have τούτων. But that seems an alteration, to suit ζήτησιν, made by Critics, who did not see that τούτου has reference to the general matter in dispute, and τούτων to the ζητήματα. It could not be, as Alf. imagines, a correction to suit Παῦλος or Ἰησοῦ, for the Revisers were not so stupid. It is scarcely necessary to advert to the mixed construction involved in ἔλεγον, by which the direct and the indirect address are blended; and the Verb carries a sense suitable to both,— 'to say,' and 'to ask.'

21. ἱπικαλ. τηρηθῶ.] a brief form of expression, by the same blending of two modes of expression, as in the verse preceding; q. d. 'making appeal, in virtue of which he laid claim to be kept,' &c.

— Σεβαστοῦ] 'Augustus.' The surname borne by all the Emperors from Caesar Octavianus, who first assumed it.

For πέμψω, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ἀναπ., from A, B, C, E, and 18 cursives; to which I add Lamb. 1182, 1184, Trin. Coll. B, x. 16, and Cov. 2, omitted by Mill. The text. rec. is pronounced by Alford to be 'simple for compound'; but ἀναπ. is more probably a bringing in a form of compound, not intended by the speaker, as using a familiar mode of address, as in the case of ἀπαντες—πυράν in those Editors of our text infra xxviii. 2, where Alford pronounces ἀνδρῶν. 'a correction to a more precise word.' Besides, πέμπειν occurs in all the copies infra v. 25.

22. ἔβουλόμην καὶ αὐτὸς τοῦ ἀνθρ. &c.] The ἔβ. &c. is best expressed in the Syriac and almost all other Versions and Translations, vellem, 'I could wish.' There is no occasion, however, with some, to suppose an ellipsis of ἀν; for, as I have shown at Rom. ix. 3, and also in my note on Thucyd. iv. 54, 3, 'Imperfects are often put for Pluperfects subjunctive,' of which numerous examples may be there seen. Consult also Kühner and Bernardy. The sense, then, is, 'I could have wished to have heard him myself; a modest way of saying, 'I could wish, if you would permit me, to hear him myself.' Lachm. and Tisch. cancel ἔφη and ὁ δὲ, on the authority of only two MSS., A and B, and the Vulg.; and Alf. pronounces both of these words 'insertions for perspicuity.' But I cannot believe that such insertions would have been introduced into all the copies except two; for I can make no addition. It seems far more probable that the ancient Greek Critics stumbled at something like tautology in ἔφη and φησὶν (which would have been avoided by a Class. writer), and the awkwardness of ὁ δὲ separated from ἔφη. The Latin Translators would be likely to adopt both emendations, as suiting the short-cut of the Latin language.

23. φαντασίας] 'pomp, state; literally, display. So the word is used in Hippocrat. τοῖσι μὲν περιόργω, μὲν κατὰ φαντασίας, and Heliodor. φαντασίας τῶν δορυφόρων, καὶ κόμπου τῆς ἄλλης θραυρίας, which exactly represents the kind of 'pomp' here meant. The

 torium is often used in the Latin. If such be the sense, it is a Latinism. As, however, there was no trial, it should rather seem to mean 'a private examination room,' where accused persons had a previous hearing, before they were committed to prison; or a sort of parlour, or drawing-room. Τοῖς κατ' ἐξοχὴν οἷσι is = τοῖς ἐξόχοις. However, οἷσι is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from A, B, C, and some 8 cur-sives; to which I add Cov. 4, omitted by Mill.
 In Cov. 2 it comes in after πόλις. It is prob.
 an interpolation.

24. οἱ συμπρόντες ἢ. &.] Equiv. to συμ-πάροικοι; for there is reference not only to the σύμβουλοι mentioned supra v. 12 (see Suet.
 Tib. 33, Gal.), but to others; namely, persons of consideration and friends of the President, to whom he had given, 'honoris gratiâ,' a place on the bench; conf. Jos. Antt. xvi. 11, 2 and 4, τὸν βασιλεύοντα νῦν ἡμῶν, καὶ σοὶ παρακαθε-σάμενος; xvii. 5, 3. For πᾶν, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ἅπαν, for which there is strong authority.

—ἐνέτυχόν μοι] 'have made application to me.' The word properly signifies 'to address oneself to, hold converse with any one;' and it is usually implied that the purpose is some request or petition. So Philo, 629 B, ἐνενύχσαν τῷ Θεῷ, ἵνα ἐξ ἀμνησίων ῥύσεται συμφορῶν.
 Wisd. viii. 21, ἐνέτυχον τῷ Κυρίῳ, καὶ ἐδείχθη αὐτοῦ, and espec. Josephus, Antt. xvi. 6, 5;
 where, in an epistle to the Governor of Cyrene, Agrippa says to the Jews, ἐνέτυχόν μοι νῦν, ὡς
 ὑπὸ τινῶν συκοφαντῶν ἐπηρεάζοντο.

25. καὶ αὐτοῦ διὰ τούτου ἐπικ. τὸν Σ.] Render: 'and the person himself withal having appealed unto Cæsar.' Comp. Thucyd. vi. 33, Ἀθηναῖοι αὐτοὶ οὗτοι.

26. τῷ Κυρίῳ] 'The Sovereign,' 'my Sovereign;' meaning Nero. A title of the Roman Emperors, corresponding to the Latin Domitianus, which was rejected as invidious by Augustus and Tiberius; but accepted by Caligula, and the succeeding Emperors. Notwithstanding Tiberius' alleged rejection of the title, it is plain that it was commonly ascribed to him from the verse of Phædr. Fab. ii. 5, 'perambulantia læta Domino viridia,' said of course of Tiberius.

 but a previous private examination in order to future public trial; a sense often found in the Civilians, from whom several examples are adduced by Grotius. And so the word is used in Demosth. 1142, 1066.

For γράψαι, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit γράψω, from A, B, C, and 5 cursives; confirmed, they think, by all the ancient Versions; but, as Jacks. of Leicester long ago saw, this is not a case where Versions have any authority.
 External evidence is quite against γράψω, and internal evidence also, since it is far less likely that γράψαι should, as Alf. thinks, have been altered to suit the τι γράψαι above, than that the Alexandrine Critics should have written γράψω, to remove a tautology, and introduce a better Grecism; espec. the latter. Thus the two principal uncial and cursive MSS. B and 13 have γράψω above as well as here. Besides, all the Versions render by the same word in the former, as in the latter place. Hence it is probable that the reading γράψω originated (like very many others) in the Versions, not in any Greek copies.

XXVI. 1. For ὑπὲρ, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read περὶ, from A, C, E, H, and 8 cur-sives (to which I can only add Cov. 2, unnoticed by Mill); very insufficient authority; espec.
 since internal evidence is against περὶ, for it was more likely that ὑπὲρ should have been altered to περὶ by Critics who thought that the sense was 'to speak respecting thyself,' and consequently altered ὑπὲρ to περὶ. But the sense intended evidently was 'to speak for thyself;' as all the ancient Versions represent it,—a use of ὑπὲρ found in the best Class. writers; see my Lex. It is in vain to argue that this was no trial, and that Paul was merely speaking about himself, for it was a quasi trial, an ἀνάκρισις, to collect further information to lay before the Supreme Court, to which Paul had appealed.
 In short, the sense I have laid down is demanded by the subjoined term ἀπελογεῖτο, and by the very nature of the speech, which is ἀπολογία throughout.—ἐκτείνας τὴν χεῖρα, graphicé;
 such being the attitude for a set speech. So δημηγορήσαν· and Apul. Met. ii. p. 54, cited by Wetst., 'Porrigit dextram, et ad instar oratorum conformat articulum, duobus infirmis conclusis digitis, ceteros eminentes porrigit.' Con. and Hows., and Alf., wrongly represent the sense as, 'stretching forth the hand' that was chained, and spoken of at v. 29. But the hand stretched out was, we see, the right hand; and the hand chained would, for obvious reasons, be the left.

² ἡγῆμαι ἐμὸν μακάριον, &c.] Here we have an elegant προβαράνσις, or previous conciliation (as the ancient Rhetoricians called it), such as is found supra xvii. 22, also in Thucyd. i. 68. iii. 54, and other passages of the historians. It is, however, worthy of notice, that on the present occasion this was not a mere compliment, but, as Lardner has shown, was well merited.

—μακροθύμως] 'patiently,' 'indulgently' (see supra xxiv. 4). For it was in ancient times thought a favour to have a patient and indulgent hearing. So Jos. B. J. i. 32, 1, ἡμετέρῳ παρασχέιν μοι τὰς ἀκοὰς ἀκίρατους εἰς τὴν ἀπολογία.

—βίωσιν] meaning 'vita ratio quoad religionem,' as in Jos. Antt. xx. 2, 1, εἰς τὰ Ἰουδαίων ἴδη τὸν βίον μετέβαλλον, i. e. 'I embraced the Jewish religion;' for I suspect that there Jos. wrote τὴν βίωσιν, which must have been read by Rufinus in the fourth century. The word only occurs elsewhere (excepting two late Fathers) in the Proem to Ecclesi., δια τῆς ἐννόμου (I conj. ἐν νόμῳ) βιώσεως.—Τὴν before Ἱεροσολύμοις has been, on good authority (to which I add Cov. 2, omitted by Mill), inserted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. The two expressions ἀπ' ἀρχῆς here, and ἄνωθεν, being equivalent when associated as bearing on the same point, strongly attest that Paul came at a very early period from Tarsus to Jerusalem, for education in the school of Gamaliel.

—θρησκείας] The word here, as in James i. 27, signifies religion, though by the Class. writers it was used, like δαισιδαμονία, to denote superstition.

⁶ ἐπ' ἐλπίδι—τοῦ Θεοῦ] On the sense of ἐλπίδι some difference of opinion exists. Chrysostom and most of the earlier modern Commentators, as also Doddridge and Newcome, understand, 'the hope of the resurrection of the dead;' appealing to supra xxiii. 6 and xxiv. 15. Others, however, comprehending all the later Commentators, as Michaelis, Wakefield, Kuinoel, &c., think this view is precluded by ver. 7; and they, more properly, explain it of 'the hope of the Messiah.' Certainly the hope of the resurrection cannot here exclusively be meant; for, as Mr. Scott observes, 'it may truly be said that the promise of a Redeemer was the most prominent part of the revelation made unto Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and the grand subject of prophecy; while the doctrine of the resurrection was not so fully revealed in the Old Test. as in the New.' 'The resurrection of Jesus demonstrated that he was the promised Messiah, against all the unbelieving Jews; and the doctrine of the resurrection, against the Sadducees.' Admitting, then, the principal meaning of ἐλπίς to be the promise of the Messiah and his kingdom; yet that must necessarily involve the promise of the resurrection of the dead by his means, as the promise was proved to have been fulfilled by Christ's rising from the dead; and as his resurrection was the pledge and proof of our own, it may here be admitted as a secondary sense.

7. I continue to retain ἐν in preference to the Stephanic πρὸς, because, in itself, more appropriate, and supported by no incompetent authority,—A, B, C, and 8 cursives; to which I add Lamb. 1185, Trin. Coll. B, x. 16, and Cov. 4, omitted by Mill. The πρὸς probably arose from a Scholiast, who did not comprehend the true force of ἐν. At the last clause of the verse Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. cancel τῶν, and Tisch. cancels βασιλεῦ, while Lachm. and Alf. remove it to the end of the sentence. There is considerable authority in uncials for these changes; but very slender in cursives. For the removing of τοῦ τῶν I can, however, add 1181, 1182, Trin. Coll. B, x. 16, and Cov. 2, omitted by Mill; and internal evidence is rather in its favour. As to the Ἀγρίππα, it might be introduced to match ver. 2, or be removed as a tautology, or as unnecessary. As to the position of βασιλεῦ at the end of the verse, it may have come from Critics who thought it promoted δεινότης. As to the τῶν, I would not pronounce positively either way. If we could place reliance on the fidelity of those ancient copies of the Alexandrine Recension, there would be a strong radiocination, and the sense might be expressed, with Conyb., thus:—'Yet this hope, O King, is charged against me as my crime; and that by Jews!' But this is more in the style of a profane Orator than of an Apostle. I would propose the following rendering:—'Concerning which hope I am brought into accusation by the Jews, O King (Agrippa).' This is confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions.

8. I still continue to point τί! as was done by Wetst., Griesb., and Scholz, and is approved and adopted by Conyb.; though Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. point τί ἀπιστον; though the most ancient MSS. and the text in the Cat. Oxon., confirm the former mode, which is more agreeable to Paul's style. See Rom. iii. 9. vi. 15. It may be true that, as Stier says, 'Sadduceism had tainted the Herodian family, and also the most wealthy and highly cultivated classes.' Yet I scarcely think that Paul would, on the present occasion, bring a sort of direct charge against Agrippa. It were more probable that he should do it in the indirect mode by 'What! Is it judged by some among you a thing incredible if (as is the case) God raiseth the dead?' Of this use, which is found both in the Script. and Class. writers, see Matth., Kühn., and Winer's Grammars, and my Lex. in v. 'This,' as Conyb. remarks, 'is an argumentum ad homines to the Jews, whose own Scriptures furnished them with cases where the dead had been raised; as, for example, by Elisha.'

9. ἐγὼ μὲν οὖν, &c.] I am now of opinion that the μὲν οὖν is here again resumptive and continuative of the matter at vv. 4, 5; but the force of the ἐγὼ emphatic points at the sense which I thought necessary, in order to trace the connexion. 'And remember, however positive you may be in your own opinion, you may be mistaken, and your judgment may be deceived. I, for instance, thought with myself (i. e. was self-persuaded), that I ought,' &c. In ἔδοξα ἐμναυῶ there is an idiom (confined, however, to the first person, and almost always in the Present tense) of which many examples are adduced by Wetstein.—δεῖν—πράξαι. The phraseology is idiomatical, and may be rendered, 'that I was bound, in many ways, to oppose the doctrine of Jesus.'

10. After πολλοὺς, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. add τε, from 3 uncials and some few cursive MSS. But there is no place for the Particle, which may have arisen from an abbreviation of the τῶν following. But if Luke used any Particle, it would be δέ, which is adduced from two ancient cursives; to which I add Lamb. 1182, 1184. The form is found in Matt. xvi. 18. Mark iv. 36. John vi. 51. viii. 16, 17. Acts v. 32. 2 Tim. iii. 12. Heb. ix. 21, and in the best Class. writers, and was likely to be passed over as unnecessary. The sense is, 'quasiimmo.'

—τῶν dy.] 'the Christians.' The Apostle ventures to use this expression, which he would not have done, as being invidious, to a Jewish audience. See more in Birk's Hor. Apost. vii. 7. I have now, with Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., admitted the ἐν before φυλ., found in A, B, C, R, G, and 20 cursives; to which I add Lamb. 1183, Mus. 16, 184, Cov. 4 (omitted by Mill), and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16; and internal evidence is in its favour, since it was more likely to be omitted than inserted; and it is almost always used in the Gr. Test., the Sept., and the Classical writers.

— ἀναιρουμένων τε αὐτῶν κατ. ψῆφ.] Render: 'when they were being destroyed,' 'put to death' (for trial was equiv. to destruction), 'I cast down my vote [with those who condemned them];' meaning, 'I concurred with them;' equiv. to what is said supra xxii. 20, ἡμῶν συνουδοκῶν [αὐτοῖς] τῇ ἀναιρέσει, &c. Whether the κατὰ be intensive or not, is not quite certain; that it is, is probable from the peculiarity of the phrase, which occurs no where else, but only φίρειν ψῆφον, and this seems required by the yet stronger expression just after, περισσῶς ἐμμαινόμενος. But if this be the case, it rather goes against the figurative sense here assigned by most Expositors, though confirmed by xxii. 20. However, that is not decisive; and I am inclined to think, with Conyb. and Alf., that the phrase may most naturally be taken in its proper sense; and, if so, it bears testimony to the fact, that Paul was at that time a member of the Sanhedrim. The passage xxii. 20, will not decide against that view, since Paul might be elected a member of that body after the time of Stephen's death, and there is nothing to forbid this in his age; for though called νεανίας at vii. 58, that will prove nothing, since the term is sometimes applied to men in the very vigour of manhood, and even beyond; and there is reason to think that Paul could not be less than thirty years of age when sent to Damascus.

11. τιμωρῶν αὐτοὺς ἡνάγκ. βλασφημεῖν] 'I, by tormenting, sought to compel them to blaspheme.' The Christian converts were then, and still more afterwards, compelled by torture to pronounce certain forms expressive of abuse of Jesus, and consequently abandonment of his religion; as appears from Pliny's Epist. xiii. 97. Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 34, and other passages. That τιμωρ. is capable of this sense is plain from Menander's drama, called ὁ ἑαυτὸν τιμωρ., 'The Self-tormentor.'

— περισσῶς ἐμμαινόμενος] A very strong expression, which may be rendered, 'and being exceedingly infuriate against them.' It is a very rare word, though formed regularly from ἐμμανής, of which the Expositors and Lexicographers adduce no other example; yet it occurs in Jos. Antt. xvii. 6, δ, ἐμμαινόμενον πᾶσι τοῦ βασιλέως, and Eriphan. t. i. p. 92, οὗτοι δὲ—ἐμμανέστες.

— ἕως καὶ εἰς] Render; 'as far as and even unto foreign cities;' the construction being adapted to εἰς, and not to ἕως. This circumstance, as meant not of Damascus only, but of other cities, though unrecorded, serves to introduce the narrative following.

12. ἐν οἷς] scil. πράγμασι, 'in which things being occupied.'—πορευόμενος, 'while going.'

13. περιλάμψαν με] 'beaming around me.'

14. For δέ, A, B, C, E, and not a few cursives (I add Lamb. 1184, and Cov. 2, omitted by Mill), read τε, which is adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. Internal evidence is in its favour, and it is probably the true reading.

15. ὁ δέ] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. subjoin Κύριος, from 5 uncial and 20 cursive MSS. I can only add Trin. Coll. B, x. 16; and the word is manifestly from a marginal Scholium; as in the Παῦλος after ὁ δέ at v. 25, where, however, Lachm. receives it, and also Tisch., ed. 1, but in ed. 2 he rejects it; then why not here? the case being just the same, and the state of the evidence almost the same. Alford rejects the word in both passages, remarking here, that 'it is most improbable that the word should have been used by St. Paul.' On the other hand, Conyb. receives it, 'because it agrees better with what follows.' For my own part, I agree with Alford, who is, at least, consistent; while Tisch. has shown a mutability and inconsistency which tends to destroy his judgment.

16. The particulars here contained are not found in the account supra, chap. ix.; but are here introduced by the Apostle in order to show the authority he had for what he was doing, in evangelizing the heathens. Alford thinks that 'there can be no question that Paul here condenses into one various sayings of our Lord to him at different times, in visions; see chap. xxii. 18—21; and by Ananias, chap. ix. 15. Nor can this,' he adds, 'on the strictest view, be considered any deviation from truth: it is what all must, more or less, do, who are abridging a narrative, or giving the general sense of things said at various times.' But I must protest against so latitudinarian a principle; and I must affirm, with Stier, the necessity of maintaining that all these words were actually spoken to Paul, at the same time by the Lord. See ver. 19, where the Apostle expressly refers to this particular vision, — οὐκ ἰγνέμεν ἀπειθῆς τῇ οὐρανίῳ ὀψασίᾳ.

— ὧν τε εἶδες—σοι] The first ὧν is for ἐκείνων & (see xxii. 15), and the second ὧν for ἐκείνων [καθ'] &. — Ὄφθῆσομαι σοι, 'I will reveal myself to thee' (see Is. xl. 5); which may be understood, 1. of the personal appearance of Christ to St. Paul; 2. of the revelations of the Gospel of Christ, which were vouchsafed to him.

17. Ἐξαιρούμενος] This seems to mean choosing, setting apart for myself; a signification occurring in Job xxxvi. 21. Isaiah xlviii. 10. Jos. Antt. iv. 8, 5, and sometimes in the Classical writers, which is quite agreeable to the context; the expression serving to explain the foregoing one, προχειρίσασθαι σε ὑπὲρ τὴν. Here, then, Paul is said to be 'chosen out of all the nations of the world,' both τοῦ λαοῦ, the people of Israel, and the nations at large, Gentiles, as, on another occasion, supra ix. 15, he is declared to be 'a chosen vessel,' σκεῦος ἐκλογῆς; and so he speaks of himself, Rom. i. 1, as ἀφωρισμένος εἰς εὐαγγέλιον Θεοῦ.

— εἰς οὓς] This must (as appears from v. 20) be understood both of the Jews and the Gentiles, though the words which immediately follow are more applicable to the latter. And it appears that the Apostle was, for many years of the earlier part of his ministry, employed in heathen countries; see Gal. i. 17, seqq.

18. ἀνοῖξαι ὀφθαλμούς αὐτῶν, &c.] These words are meant to show the purpose and intent of his ministry, and of the Gospel in general, — 'to open the eyes of those spiritually blind,' whether Jews or Gentiles. The τοῦ ἐπιστρέφειν denotes 'purpose.' — Τοῦ ἐπιστρέφειν, scil. αὐτοῦ, lit. 'for them to turn' ('be turned,' Neut. for Pass.) from darkness to light; 'being enlightened by the Gospel, and the power of the Spirit attending it; for the power of the Spirit accompanying the word is supposed,—that being, as Calvin well observes, to the outward ministry what the soul is to the body. The next words were meant chiefly for the Gentiles, but were but too applicable to Jews. The next clause, τοῦ λαβεῖν, &c., points at the result of the former. And here πίστει must, as appears from supra xx. 32, be referred, not to ἡγίασμα, but to λαβεῖν, as Calvin saw, who well remarks, 'Sequitur remissio peccatorum, quæ nos sibi Deus gratis reconciliat, ut placatum nobis et propitium fore non dubitemus. Tandem complementum omnium ponitur ultimo loco, vitæ scilicet æternæ hereditas. Sensus est, fide nos venire in possessionem bonorum omnium, quæ per Evangelium offeruntur.' This construction is confirmed by the Pesch. Syr.

20. The Apostle now proceeds to declare what he did in obedience to the heavenly injunction.

— μετανοεῖν, καὶ ἐπιστρέφειν εἰς τ. Θε.] 'Here (as Calvin observes) turning unto God is placed after repentance, not as being any thing different from it, but to intimate the natural corruption and depravity of the human heart, and its alienation from God, to whom it requires to be turned in devout worship and service. And since repentance is seated in the heart, the deeds which testify it are required as the fruits worthy of repentance.' See note on Matt. iii. 8.

21. συλλαβ.—διαχ.] 'after apprehending me in the Temple, sought to make away with me.'

22. ἐπικουρίας οὖν τυχάν] Render: 'accordingly (such being the case), having obtained the help, τῆς π. τ. Θ., which cometh from God.' It is rarely that the Article is found with ἐπικουρία, but, whenever it is, I have always noticed the force of reference, e. g. in Herod. vi. 108, οὐκ ἀπέλκοντο τὴν ἐπικουρίαν, 'the proffered help.' The next words point at an action connected with that continuance and firmness,—namely, the bearing testimony to the truth; for I continue to adopt the reading μαρτυρούμενος, for text rec. τυρούμενος, from A, B, G, H, and not a few cursives (to which I add Lamb. 1185, and Cov. 4, omitted by Mill, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16); and this reading is required by the context, which demands the sense, 'bearing my testimony.' I cannot just before alter (with Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.) παρὰ to ἀπὸ, on the authority of A, B, C, and some dozen cursives

(to which I can only add Lamb. 1184, and Cov. 2, omitted by Mill), because the external authority is insufficient, and internal evidence is rather against the change; ἀπό being evidently an alteration by Critica, who did not perceive the force of παρὰ, 'at the hand of,' as the primary sense. Suffice it to refer to Matt. xxi. 42, παρὰ Κύριον ἐγένετο αὐτῇ. The next words contain the substance of the testimony, and may thus be construed:—λέγων οὐδὲν ἐκτὸς [ἐκείνων] & οἱ προφῆται ἐλάλησαν μελλόντων (for μίσ- λοντα) γίνεσθαι.

23. Here εἰ is used as it is supra v. 8, and Heb. vii. 15. These and other passages similar come under the general law of that canon of Classical philology treated on by Buttm. and Matthæi, by which εἰ is used of things possible, but not certain; q. d. 'if (as is the case, or, as you may grant).' It is here used very appropriately, because, as Conyb. observes, 'the doctrines mentioned were subjects of dispute and discussion.'

— παθητὸς is best rendered by the Vulg. passibilis; since, as Alf. observes, Paul refers to the idea of the Messiah, as liable to suffering, being in accordance with the testimony of the Prophets; and πρῶτος ἐξ ἀναστάσεως is eq. to πρῶτος ἀναστὰς, or πρωτότοκος ἐκ νεκρῶν, Col. i. 18.

24. ταῦτα ἀπολ., ὁ Φῆστ.] How Festus came to feel such great surprise as to uncourtously interrupt one addressing King Agrippa, arose, as Mr. Humphrey points out, from this,— 'that he was unable to comprehend the earnestness of the Apostle, so unlike the indifference of the upper classes at Rome on religious and moral subjects'; and, I would add, to the cold scepticism of the Heathen philosophers of the age; and hence he infers that Paul must be 'mad'; not, as many foreign Expositors explain, 'fanatical'; for that sense is forbidden by the words following, τὰ πολλά σε γράμματα εἰς μανίαν περιτρέπει! 'thy much learning (lit., 'the much learning thou hast') hath turned thee mad,' lit., 'oversets thy wits.' Comp. Lucian, Solæc., σύ δὲ ἐπὶ τῇ ἀγαν παιδείᾳ διέφθορας. Petron. 48, 'Scimus te præ literis fatuum esse.'

26. ἐπίστ. γὰρ—βασιλ.] The γὰρ here is both argumentative and elliptical, introducing an argumentum e testimonio, confirming what he has said from the testimony of King Agrippa.—By τούτων are meant the life and doctrine of Jesus, his crucifixion and resurrection from the dead, the spread of the Gospel, the way in which Paul was converted, and other leading events of the rise and progress of the Christian religion;—of these facts Agrippa must have been sufficiently cognizant, to bear testimony: they were not only facts, but plain and known facts, as not done ἐν γωνίᾳ,—a strong expression (of which examples abound in the Class. writers),—to denote 'publicity.' But, as Calv. remarks, Paul soon brings Agrippa to the far more important point, appealing to 'the Law and the Prophets'; and thus makes him a still more trustworthy witness, as professedly 'believing the Prophets,' and therefore capable of judging as to the fulfilment of the Prophetic predictions in the person of the crucified Jesus.—But, to advert briefly to the reading of the text. There are marvellous variations of reading, but none entitled to be received; for for although Lachm. and Tisch. 1, cancel οὐδὲν, from A, C, and 7 cursives (I add Lamb. 1182, 1183); yet that arose from the Critics stumbling at the two negatives, and removing one. Thus, others retained οὐδὲν, and removed οὐ (which is also absent from Lamb. 1181, 1184). Tisch. 2 restores, and Alf. retains, the word; changing, however, the form to οὐδὲν, but only from one MS.—B. I can, however, confirm it from Cov. 2 (omitted by Mill). Perhaps the true reading is οὐδ' ἐν, which often occurs in the Cov. 2 (of the 11th century), and other ancient MSS., especially B.

27. πιστεύεις—προφῆταις; οἶδα ὅτι πιστεύεις] Of this elegant use of interrogation, immediately followed by an answer on the part of the speaker himself, several examples are adduced by Grotius and Pricæus (so Lucian, Dial. Meret., τί φῆς; ποιῆσαι ταῦτα; ποιῆσεις, οἶδα), yet none such as to equal in force and gravity the present passage.

28. ἐν ὀλίγῳ με πείθεις, &c.] These words of Agrippa seem to have broken off the thread of the Apostle's reasoning; otherwise he would probably have proceeded to adduce some particular proofs from the Prophets of the fulfilment of prophecy in Jesus.

The words of Agrippa in answer, ἐν ὀλίγῳ, &c., may be supposed to have been merely pronounced in that complimentary insincerity, into which good-natured, easy, and unscrupulous persons, like Agrippa (and such he is characterized by Josephus), are apt to run. Besides, it is unlikely that any strong impression could have been made so soon; or that, if made, Agrippa would have interrupted the Apostle, and then left him almost as abruptly as Felix had done, or as Pilate had treated our Lord, without waiting to hear the conclusion of his sentence. This, no doubt, arose from the Apostle's having become more personal, in his application to Agrippa concerning religion, than he liked. As to the exact sense of the words, I am still of opinion that, among the various interpretations which have been propounded of this passage, the most simple, and least liable to objection, is that of Chrys., who takes ἐν ὀλίγῳ as standing for παρὰ μικρόν, almost, by an ellipse of διαστήματι. The interpretation which supposes an ellipse of μέρει, 'in a small degree,' yields a tolerable, though feeble sense; and requires proof of the existence of the phrase. The same objection applies to the sub-audition of ἀγῶνι, or πόνῳ. The interpretation of Conyb., 'with little persuasion,' yields a good sense, but is utterly destitute of proof. Precisely the same objection applies, in a stronger degree, to Alford's interpretation, 'lightly;' for if it were an Adverbial phrase, it could only have such a sense as could be shown to exist in ὀλίγος. It may, indeed, as has been thought, be a great objection to the first mentioned interpretation, that no examples have been adduced of this use of ἐν ὀλίγῳ for ὀλίγου, or παρ' ὀλίγου: but anomaly may be expected in a not very pure Greek writer. If, however, it should be thought that the objection is not to be got over, I would adopt the interpretation of Calv., Schoettg., Olsh., and Neand., who take the expression for ἐν ὀλίγῳ χρόνῳ = ταχέως, examples of which sense of ἐν ὀλίγῳ I find in Pind. Pyth. viii. 96. Plato, p. 22. Demosth. p. 33, 18, and ἐν ὀλίγῳ very often in Thucyd., and other of the best writers. This is confirmed by the Vulg. 'in modico, sc. tempore;' and so 'modico' occurs in Ovid, and other of the best Latin writers. Thus the sense will be, 'Thou art very shortly persuading me to be a Christian;' q. d. 'You are making short work in converting me to Christianity.' As to the objection of Alf., that thus the expression 'does not correspond to ἐν (μυγᾶν) in Paul's answer,' I reply, that the evidence for μεγ. is too slender (only A, B, and 4 cursives) to merit attention, much less reception. It was resorted to, to get rid of a difficulty; for a stronger term than πολλῶ might be expected, even παντί, as is expressed in E. V. But, as Grot. observes, πολλῶ is used by the Apostle instead of παντί only because Agrippa had said ἐν ὀλίγῳ, his intention being 'servare idem dicendi genus.' It is well known that this seizing of the words of another speaker, and giving them a dextrous turn in favour of an argument or a purpose, has ever been accounted a masterly stroke in an orator; though it will often require a slight detortion of the usual force of a word or phrase; which is the case here as regards πολλῶ.

²⁹ εὐξαίμην ἂν τῷ Θεῷ] Render: 'I could wish to God,' or, 'I would to God;' and so it is sometimes used in the Class. writers; e. gr. Æschin. Dial. iii. 6, ἐγὼ δὲ εὐξαίμην ἂν τὰ κοινὰ ταῦτα εἰδέναι: also in Jos. Antt. xvii. 5, 6, καὶ γὰρ αὐτοὶ εὐχέσθαι—μηδὲν δόκουντα φερωῶν.

—εἰ μὴ ἐπεκέκλητο K.] For thus the power of the judge, whether for acquittal or condemnation, had ceased, and the cognizance of the cause rested solely with the Superior Court; and consequently the good-natured remark of Agrippa was utterly fruitless; there being now no retreat to Festus, no release to Paul.

These are J. Conybeare's and Howson's instructive and interesting work, entitled Life and Epistles of St. Paul, and whose Geographical notes are here, and every where else, in their work, full of instruction of the most important kind.

1. ἐκρίθη τοῦ ἀν. Here τοῦ is Genit. of 'purpose,' of which examples often occur; and ἐκρ. is for κρίσις ἐγενήθη. Comp. xx. 3, ἐν γνῶμῃ τοῦ ὑποστρίψιν.

—σπείρης Σεβ. From the time of Augustus, legions took the name Augustian. Hence many have supposed that, as in all the other legions, so in the five cohorts stationed at Caesarea, there was one cohort called 'the Augustan,' or that the cohort here mentioned was a legionary cohort of an Augustan legion stationed in Syria and Judaea. But this view lies open to several objections, which have been forcibly urged by Wieseler; who shows, at least, that the corps may have been one so called, not of Caesarea, but of Rome; and he goes far to prove, that this Julius belonged to the Augustani of Tacit. xiv. 15, and Suet. Nero, 20, 25, a body of evocati, or veterans, summoned to service by the Emperors, and first of all by Augustus (Dio Cass. i. 45, 12). To this corps Wies. and Alf. think 'Julius' belonged; and that, having been sent on some service into Asia (why not Syria?), was now returning to Rome.

2. Ἀδραμ. a ship of Ἀδραμ., a sea-port in Mysia, over against Lesbos. The expression τοὺς κατὰ τὴν Ἀσίαν τόπους is meant to designate place by an Accusat. of direction. Comp. Polyb. i. 4, πλεῖν τοὺς κατὰ τὴν Ἀσίαν τόπους. For μέλλοντες, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read μέλλοντι, from A, B, and 7 cursives (I add Lamb. 1182, 1184, 1185, and Mus. 16, 184); a reading confirmed by the Pesh. Syr. Copt., Eth., and Armen. Versions, and by the earliest copy of the Vulg. As to internal evidence, it is equally balanced; for as the —s may be, as Alf. says, a correction to suit ἱπβάντες, so may —τι be a correction to suit πλοίῳ Ἀδρ. However, μέλλοντι is probably, but not certainly, the true reading. The sense is substantially the same either way; the scope of the words being, to assign a reason why they went on board this Adramyttian vessel; namely, either because they had to coast the [southern] part of Asia, and therefore a vessel bound, on a coasting voyage, to Adramyttium would go as far as they would desire in the way to Italy; or because she was about to coast. But the latter is the more natural view. As to the εἰς before τοὺς, adopted by Lachm. and Tisch. 1, from A, B, and 7 cursives (I add Lamb. 1184), I still reject it, as did Tisch. on second thoughts; and so Alf. The Revisers, who introduced the εἰς (or as others ἐπι) were, it seems, ignorant of the phrase πλεῖν τὴν θάλασσαν, though found in Hdot., Dem., Lysias, Andoc., and other of the best writers. In Thucyd. vi. 63, πλόντες τὰ ἐπικεῖνα τῆς Σικελίας, the same blunder has been committed by Reiske and Dobree, who would introduce an εἰς; but that, far from being necessary, injures the sense; which, as Poppo shows, is, praternavigare oram Siciliae; exactly as here.

3. ἐπιμελ. τυχεῖν] 'to experience, to receive kind attention,' not only by kind hospitality and care at the time, but by the supply of necessities for the voyage.

4. ὑπεπλεύσαμεν τ. Κ.] We may render, 'in the lee of Cyprus;' to understand which we must consider the circumstances of the case, and the situation of the place. Now in sailing from Sidon to the coast of Lycia, it is probable that, had the weather been fair, they would have taken a course to the south of Cyprus,—and thence would have struck across to Rhodes, or the coast of Caria. Since, however, we are told, 'the winds were contrary' (viz. though varying, yet all more or less adverse), they changed that course, and ὑπεπλεύσ. τὴν Κ. Now, for the winds to be contrary, they must have been N. or N.E., or N.N.E., or such like. And then the best way to evade their force would be, to sail close under the N. coast of Cyprus, after having cut across to the promontory of Pedalium, so as to reach the bay of Cattium. It is plain that ὑποπλεῖν must mean to sail under the lee of any high land (such as Cyprus), so as to get shelter from it. From Zephyrium it is plain they crossed over (διεπλεύσαντο) to Myra in Lycia; a port of great celebrity, and (as appears from a passage of Porphyry cited by Wetstein) the one generally used in passing from Cyprus to Lycia or Caria.

5. διαπλεύσαντες] The full sense is, 'having sailed through and across,' i. e. from the E. promontory of Cyprus (Dinaretum) to Myra. It seems, from what Mr. Smith says, that they

κίας. ⁶ Κάκεϊ εὐρών ὁ ἐκατόνταρχος πλοῖον Ἀλεξανδρίνον πλέον εἰς τὴν Ἰταλίαν, ἐνεβίβασεν ἡμᾶς εἰς αὐτό. ⁷ Ἐν ἰκαναῖς δὲ ἡμέραις βραδυπλοοῦντες, καὶ μόλις γενόμενοι κατὰ τὴν Κνίδον, μὴ προσεῶντος ἡμᾶς τοῦ ἀνέμου, ὑπεπλεύσαμεν τὴν Κρήτην κατὰ Σαλμώνην ⁸ μόλις τε παραλεγόμενοι αὐτήν, ἤλθομεν εἰς τόπον τινὰ καλούμενον Καλοὺς Λιμένας, ὃ ἐγγὺς ἦν πόλιν Λασαία. ⁹ Ἰκανοῦ δὲ χρόνου διαγενομένου, καὶ ὄντος ἤδη ἐπισφαλούς τοῦ πλοῦς, διὰ τὸ καὶ τὴν νηστείαν ἤδη παρεληλυθέναι, παρήγει ὁ Παῦλος ¹⁰ λέγων αὐτοῖς· Ἄνδρες, θεωρῶ ὅτι μετὰ ὕβρεως καὶ πολλῆς ζημίας,—οὐ μόνον τοῦ *φορτίου

6. πλοῖον] Here, as often in the Classical writers, the word denotes 'a ship of burden' (as opposed to a ship of war), such as the Alexandrian corn vessels were, of which this was one. This ship had, Mr. Smith thinks, been prevented from taking the direct course to Italy by the S. of Crete by the prevailing W. winds.

7. βραδυπλ.] A rare word, of which I find no other examples than in Artem. iv. 32, and Cosmos Indic. ap. Bekk. Anecd. i. 225. The ship might well sail slowly, since, as Mr. Smith shows, the wind was nearly N.W., bringing strong blasts off the Etesiae.

—μὴ προσεῶντος] The word προσ. occurs no where else; but the sense is evidently, 'not letting us go forward': πρόσ in composition for πρόσω. And in this Mr. Smith and Admiral Penrose acquiesce. It is strange that Meyer, De Wette, and Conybeare and Howson should think the sense to be, 'would not allow them to put into the harbour of Cnidus.' All this error arose from not attending to the above force of πρόσ for πρόσω, which I have proved by references to several passages, of which one must suffice,—Soph. Phil. 41, πῶς γὰρ ἂν νοῦσαν προσβαίη μακράν; There may seem some harshness in the term (besides its rarity), but not more than in εἰσεῖν in Geopon. xv. 2, 'let go in.'

8. μόλις τε παραλεγ. αὐτήν] I agree with Smith and Howson, that it is better to refer the αὐτήν to Crete, not to Salomone (indeed, the Verb παρ. would not suit a promontory); meaning the S. coast of Crete. With the wind at N.W. they would easily round the point, but would then have to beat up, with difficulty, along the coast to Cape Matala. Besides, there are several craggy islets here and there, skirting the coast, which would increase the difficulty.

—Καλοὺς Λιμένας] This name, as we find from Pococke and Pashly, Trav. ii. 57, still remains, and is described by the latter as an excellent harbour; but only, it seems, in summer-time, and as a shelter from W. winds.

—ἢν πόλιν Λασαία] Of this we find no mention in the Classical writers. Hence Commentators either resort to conjectures, or suppose this one of the towns of the hundred-cities isle not mentioned by the geographers, or other writers. There is little doubt, however, that Lasos is meant, which occurs in Pliny's list, iv. 8, of the island towns; and Lasaea was, it is plain, such. The difference between the two names is trifling; since πόλιν Λασαία means, in fact, the city of Lasos. So Hesych., Λασίων πόλιν ἢ χωρίον, where read Λασαίων. The town was probably on the brow of the chain of hills which rise about four miles from the shore. I agree with Mr. Howson, that the Lasia of the Pentinger Tables—there said to be sixteen miles E. of Gortynia—is the Lasaea of Luke.

9. Ἰκανοῦ χ.—παραληλυθ.] Render: 'but when considerable time had elapsed, and navigation had already become dangerous by reason of the Fast being now past.' Alford is positive that the time spoken of 'must be the time spent at the anchorage.' But why must?—? since we are told nothing of the length of the delay. It is not without reason that almost all Expositors take it of the time since the embarkation, which is the most natural view. The same may be said of his rendering πλοῦς by 'the voyage to Rome'; espec. since the usual interpretation is confirmed by the ancient Versions, and is called for by the next words. As to the passage of Acts xxi. 7, there τὸν πλοῦν means 'the course from Tyre'; but here there is no addition, and consequently the sense must be 'sailing,' lit. 'the act of sailing'; as in Thucyd. i. 54, τὸν πλοῦν ἐπ' οἶκον παρασκευάζοντο. Lucian, V. H. i. 5, οὐρίῳ ἀνέμῳ τὸν πλοῦν ποιοῦμένην. So Arat. Phæn. 154, says of the very time of year when the Etesian westerly gales prevail, τήμῳ καὶ κελιάδοντες Ἑτησίαι οὐρίῳ πόντῳ [ἀθρόοι ἐμπύκνουσιν] ὃ δὲ πλοῦς οὐκ ἐστὶ κωπαις [ἔριος, 'seasonable for sailing.' The best Commentators have been long agreed that in τὴν νηστείαν we have a designation of time made after the manner of the Jews, and even Heathens, whereby a particular time of the year is denoted by some Festival which falls at that time, as we say Christmas, Lady-day, and Michaelmas. The Fast here meant was the day of Expiation, or 10th of Tisir (answering to the beginning of our October), and thus nearly corresponding to our Old Michaelmas. Now, in our own times, the Levantine sailors particularly dread what they call the Michaelmas foves. Alford, indeed, says, that the sailing did not close so early. But even at the time of the Fast it was considered as not safe, incurring some danger, which is all that the ἐπικρίσις in popular parlance means.

10. ὕβρεως] The word here, as infra 21, signifies damage; as Anthol. iii. 22, 58, θαλάττης ὕβριν. Pind. Pyth. i. 140, ναυσίστονον ὕβριν ἰδών, and Jos. Autt. iii. 6, 4.

11. τῷ κυβερνήτῃ καὶ τῷ ναυκλ.] These offices were properly distinct; on the nature and difference of whose duties I have copiously treated in Recens. Synop., adducing a great body of proofs and illustrations from the Classical writers. Suffice it here to say, that the former term denoted the master, the latter the super-cargo. But it was only large merchant ships, like this, that had both. The smaller had but one person for both offices, who was then called ναύκληρος.

12. ἀνευθέτου] for the Class. ἀνεπιτηδείου, Thucyd. ii. 20. The place was unfit to winter in, as not being a regular port.

— εἰς Φοῖνικα] 'to Phoenix,' called by Ptolemy Φοινικοῦς, and the city inland Φοῖνιξ, the present port Lutro. From its description (with which I would compare Pausan. v. 25, 2, ἄκραν τατραμμίην ἐπὶ Λιβύης καὶ Νότου), we may (as Grotius and Schmid. think) infer that the port was formed by two jutting horns, which looked to seaward to the s.w. and n.w. respectively. That Lutro is Φοῖνιξ has been evinced by Mr. Smith.

13. ὑποπνεύσαντος δὲ νότου] 'a gentle south wind having sprung up.' Comp. Virg. Æn. iii. 70, 'lenis crepitans vocat Auseter in altum,' and Eurip. Phœn. 218, Ζεφύρου πνοαῖς ἱππεύσαντος ἐν οὐρανῷ Κάλλισταυ κελάδημα.

— δόξαντες τῆς προθ. κεκρατ.] The Vulg. and Tyndale render as if the reading were κρατεῖν, 'thinking to obtain their purpose.' But they did not see that there is here an ellipsis of αὐτοὺς, which is to be supplied to the verb, as often in New Test., with the Inf. Pres. and Aorist. The use of the Perf. is, however, so rare, that I have noted it no where else. Render: 'supposing that they had (in a manner) accomplished their purpose,' which was to sail safely along the South coast of Crete; which they thought they should now effect,—since, though the wind that had sprung up was not favourable, yet, that being so gentle a breeze, it would not hinder them from maintaining their course.

— ἄραντες] Here it is usual to supply ἀγκυραῖν, which word is often expressed, as in several passages cited by Wetstein. The term, however, may also allude to the raising of the masts, which were usually lowered on reaching shore. So in Thucyd. vii. 26, ἄραν ἐκ τῆς Αἰγύπτου where the Schol. supplies τὰ ἱστία.

3, et al. Joa. Antt. i. 20, l. xix. 2, 4. Hippocr., Plut., &c. It signifies, not searer, but very near, and here answers to our nautical term in-shore. Thus the phrase ἄσπον παραλίγισθαι signifies to coast along close in-shore.

14. αὐτῆς] It is not agreed to what this has reference. Some suppose to προθέσας, others to πρώσας; while others again refer it to Κρήτην. I have heretofore supposed it to refer to the ship; but, from what has been said by Conyb. and Alf., I see that such a reference is indefensible; and I agree with Conyb., that κατ' αὐτῆς refers to the preceding word Κρήτην, and is said of the wind, as in the Homeric lines, βῆ δὲ κατ' Οὐλύμποιο καρήνων—κατ' Ἰδαίῳ ὀρίαν, 'down from Crete,' i. e. the high-land chain of Ida, surmounting the coast. This, too, is confirmed by Admiral Penrose, who represents the wind as 'descending from the lofty hills in squalls and eddies.' It was doubtless produced, as Conyb. supposes, 'by the wind coming down one of the gullies (rather, some gullies) on the flanks of Ida.' The only point in this interpretation at which we may pause is, at taking ἔβαλε in the Neuter sense 'rushed'; which ought to have been proved. That, however, may be done from Hom. Il. xi. 722, ποταμός—εἰς ἅλα βάλλων. Of course in both passages the sense is reflexive, by ellipse of εἰαντ., as found in Æschyl. Agam. 1142, θιρόμουνε—ἐν πείθῃ βάλλων, where Blomf. adduces Eur. Cycl. 571, εἰς ἔκρον βαλεῖς. I add Dan. vii. 2, οἱ τίττε. ἄνιμοι τοῦ οὐρανοῦ προσέβαλον ('darted,' 'rushed') εἰς τὴν θάλασσαν. How often this reflexive sense is found in ῥίπτω is well known. Comp. too the use of κατέβη at Luke viii. 23, where I have remarked that the term, like its synonyme κατιναί, is graphic, and alludes to the fact, that a λαίλαψ (like the ἀνεμ. τυφωνικός here), when arising on the water, seems to come right down from the mountain tops through the gullies.

— ἀνεμος τυφωνικός] meaning 'a wind like the Typhoon:' the name then, and to the present day, given to a tempestuous wind prevailing in the Mediterranean, and blowing a sort of hurricane in all directions from N.E. to S.E., and perhaps meant in Homer, Odys. v. 313, and Virg. Æn. i. 103—112. With reference to the very perplexing term Εὐροκλύδων, various objections have been made to the common reading, but of no great weight. To advert to the chief objection,—the impossibility of the compound,—it should be remembered, that κλύδων may signify

not only 'a wave,' but 'a rough watery sea' (see the examples in Steph. Thes.), and must have been sometimes used as an Adjective (which, indeed, I suspect, was its original form), as appears from the Adjective Ἐρικλύδων, which is used by a later Greek writer cited in Steph. Thes. Of the conjectures which have been proposed, purely to evade the difficulty, the only ones that merit attention are Εὐρυκλύδων and Εὐρακλύδων. But for the former, propounded by Toup, there is no authority at all. For the latter (namely Εὐρακλύδων, NN.E. wind) which has been proposed by Grotius, Mill, Le Clerc, Bentley, and Bengel, there is some, though very slender, authority in MSS. and Versions; while the objections against it are,—1. that it would not be formed analogically, but ought to be Εὐροακλύδων. 2. that it would not at all correspond to the accurate descriptions of the τυφῶν, or Typhoon, given by ancients and moderns, who agree in representing it, not as a point-wind, but as veering about, and blowing in all quarters in succession from N.E. to S.E.,—East, however, prevailing. Thus far in my former Edd.—On carefully re-considering the question, with the aid of the valuable assistance supplied by Mr. Smith, and Messrs. Conybe and Hows, together with the extensive collations of the Lamb., Mus., and Trin. Coll. collections, I must say that the objections I advanced against Εὐρυκλ. are not so decisive as I heretofore supposed, and I should be willing to receive it, were any tolerable authority supplied. As to Εὐρακλύδων, the authority of A, B is considerable; and the objections I have advanced are much diminished by the explanations of Mr. Smith, and it may be the genuine reading. However, I have not found a particle of authority in the Lamb., Mus., and Trin. Coll. collections for either this or the foregoing reading, and hence I must still continue to retain Εὐροκλ., with Tisch.; and, indeed, with Alf.; though he objects, that it is 'an anomalous word,' meaning, formed contrary to analogy. But that objection is, in this case, not fatal; since, from the added words, ὁ καλούμενος, it is plain that this was the name popularly given by the sailors to the wind,—and accordingly the anomaly may be excused. As to the objection, that the word Εὐροκλύδων nowhere occurs in the ancient writers, that has no force; for—not to mention, that neither do the others,—we have no reason to expect it should occur, since we have no ancient writer who has treated on nautical affairs: and it so happens that (as Aulus Gell. remarks, Noct. Att. ii. 22) the very names of nautical things rarely occur in the Class. writers.

15. συναρπ. τοῦ πλοίου] An expression especially used of tempestuous winds, which whirl a ship round, in spite of the helm, and hurry her out of her course. So Soph. El. 1150, πάντα γὰρ συναρπάσας, θύελλ' ὤκτω. Comp. Thucyd. vi. 104, ἀναρπασθῆς ὑπ' ἀνέμου.

—ἐπιδόντες ἐφερ.] At ἐπιδ. the word elliptically understood may be either τὸ πλοῖον, or ἑαυτοῦς, which is expressed in Achill. Tat. l. i. p. 45, δότε ἑαυτὸν τῷ τοῦ δρόμου πνέματι. Lucian, t. ii. p. 74.—Of ἐφερόμεθα the sense is lit. 'we were driven,' or 'hurried, along,' as in Hom. Od. v. 343, σχεδὴν ἀνέμοις φέρεσθαι Κάλλιπτε. Hdt. iii. 10, ἐφίροντο κατὰ κύμα καὶ ἀνέμου.

16. ὑποδραμόντες] 'running under the lee of,' a use of the word found also in Plutarch, and other later Greek writers. Mr. Smith here notices in St. Luke the most perfect knowledge of nautical terms. Thus here, observes he, they ran before the wind to the leeward of Clauda; hence it is ὑποδρ.; they sailed with a side wind to the leeward of Cyprus and Crete; hence it is ὑπεπλεύσαμεν—Κλαύδην. I cannot find in the Lamb., Mus., and Trin. Coll. collections any variation from the text. rec. But though it is confirmed by Ptol. iii. 7, yet I do not doubt that the true reading here is Καύδην, as found in Jerome; or, perhaps, Καύδαν, which was probably in the original of the MS. B, which has Καύδα. It was also, I suspect, in the originals of MSS. 13 and 40, as also in those of the Cov. 2, and Mus. 16, 184, though the present copies have Κλαύδαν. The ancient Versions all discountenance Κλ., and, more or less, support Καύ., and Pliny and Mela confirm Καύδην or Καύδαν, and some of the ancient copies of the Vulg. have 'Caudam.'—περικρατεῖς γινέσθαι, for περικρατεῖν, 'to become masters of,' 'secure the boat'; which, it seems (whether it had been towed by a rope, or had hung fastened to the ship), had been nearly staved, or washed away by the waves.—The expression μόλις ἰσχόσ. is not without great propriety. The 'difficulty,' however, was not, I apprehend, what Mr. Smith supposes, that the ship was nearly filled with water, but because, as Hows. remarks, to effect it the vessel would have to be rounded to, with her head brought towards the wind;—a somewhat difficult operation in a gale of wind.

17. βοηθείαις ἐχρῶντο] The term βοηθ. here signifies props, or stays, the use of which, in the ships of the ancients, is alluded to in Aristot. Rhet. ii. 5, employed to strengthen the ship's frame-work, strained by the recent labouring in the gale: and Wets. has observed that, in the Greek writers on Mechanics, βοηθείαις is the technical term to denote stays or props. Con. and Hows. explain the term of 'the ship's tackling,' which would supply helps in such a case. But that does not exclude the use of helps which I have indicated; espec. since the tackling might be employed to bring the stays and props into use. As to the other, and far more difficult expression, ὑποζωνν. τὸ πλοῖον, I must now bow to the united authority of Mr. Smith, Admiral Penrose, and other competent judges, that there is here no allusion to 'inner bellying' a crazy

vessel, for which, indeed, there would not have been time; but simply 'undergirding,' or, technically, 'frapping' the ship; i.e. by passing cable ropes over the gunwales, and then drawing them tight, by means of pulleys and levers. This was done to prevent the too great working of the timbers, so as to keep the ship the longer together should she get on the quicksands. Another example of this use of ὑποξ. occurs in Polyb. xxvii. 2, 3, καὶ μὲν ναὺς συμβουλευσας τοῖς Ῥοδίοις ὑποκυννύναι. See also Appian, B. C. v. 91, διακυννύναι τὰ σκάφη. As to the ζεύσαντες—ναὺς in Thucyd. i. 29, that adverts to a different operation (though to the same purpose), as will appear from my note.

—χαλάσαντες τὸ σκεῦος] Among several meanings of which the term σκεῦος is susceptible, that which would strike us as likely to be the true one, is that affixed by the Peisch. Syr. Version, and adopted by most modern Expositors from Heraldus and Grot. downwards, and adopted by myself hitherto, is the 'mast'; implying, of course, the tackling belonging to it; for the sails must have been reefed previously, when the vessel had been struck by the Typhon. There was no need, as in modern ships, to cut away the mast, since it admitted of being brought down to any level, from the circumstance of its going in a socket called ἱστοδόκη; and, if that was sound and trustworthy, the mast could be got down, and out of the way. To this circumstance there seems an allusion in Isa. xxxiii. 23, in an apostrophe of singular force and beauty, by which the Assyrian army is (like the State in Hor. Od. i. 14) represented under the image of a ship of war, unhugged, ineffective, and unfit for service. The sense of the words (which are these, ἐρράγησαν τὰ σχοῖνα σου, ὅτι οὐκ ἐνίσχυσαν ὁ ἱστός ἔκλινεν, οὐ χαλάσει τὰ ἱστία, οὐκ ἀρεῖ σημεῖον) is this, 'Thy ropes are broken, for they have no power (to hold tight) [Heb. 'they hang loose'], thy mast will not bend, will not let down the sails (and tackling, for I read οὐ κλίνει), i.e. from the socket of the mast being broken.' But I bow to the authority of our nautical judges, Mr. Smith, Admiral Penrose, and Capt. Spratt, from whose accounts, however differing, as they do, it would appear that the above view is not tenable. Mr. Smith explains the expression of 'lowering,' 'sending down,' the gear connected with the fair-weather top-sails. This view is confirmed by the suffrage of Capt. Spratt; but he would understand it of the ropes and reeving (including, of course, the blocks), while Mr. Smith, far better, interprets it of the heavy yard, with the sail (already reefed), attached to it. Now this would afford much easement, by the removal of a considerable top-weight. But I see not why Capt. Spratt's view should not be included in the other, since both would come under the denomination of gear and tackling.—οὕτως ἐφέροντο. Most of the earlier Commentators take the οὕτως in the sense postea, while some of the more recent consider the οὕτως as pleonastic.

But the word is never such; and certainly not in the passage of John iv. 6, to which they refer as an example, nor in Acts xx. 11, where see my notes. We may, rather, suppose the οὕτως to here simply denote consequence, i.e. what follows necessarily from some cause, and so to bear the sense often occurring, accordingly, 'under these circumstances'; i.e. as Mr. Smith explains, 'with the storm-sail set, and on the starboard tack.' By ἐφέροντο is meant, 'were hurried forward at the mercy of the waves.' What is properly true only of the ship, which was drifted (see Smith and Penrose), being, as often, applied to the crew. So in the second fragment of Alceus, Mus. Crit. vol. i. 423, ἄμμε δ'—Ναὶ φορήματα σὺν μελαινῇ χειμῶνι μοχθεύντες μεγάλῳ κάλῳν.

18, 19. In these verses are narrated the leading occurrences of the second and third days of the gale, which, as is clear from the words σφοδρῶς χειμαζ. ἡμῶν, had continued without intermission—and the first of these was lightening the ship (which perhaps had already sprung a leak) by throwing overboard whatever was most weighty, the great mass of the lading, of the nature of which we are not informed. From the frequency of the ῥάσας ἐκβολὴν ποιῆσαι we may infer the frequency of the occurrence in ancient navigation, from the time of Jonah (see Jonah i. 5) downwards. That the ἐκβολὴ was made from the poop I infer from Æschyl. Sept. 767, πρόπρυμα δ' ἐκβολὰν φέρι ἀνδρῶν ἀφιστάων.

At ver. 19 we have the next circumstance, αὐτόχειρες τὴν σκευὴν τ. π. ἐρρίψ. The σκ. here is synonymous with τῶν σκευῶν, Jon. i. 5, and denoting all the armaments and ὄπλα of the ship,—such as cables, yards, spars, sails, and rigging, including beds and bedding, and the heavy baggage of the passengers.—The terms αὐτόχειρες—ἐρρίψαμεν serve to show the imminence of the danger with which both passengers and seamen were threatened; who we find with their own hands threw out whatever was heavy, how ill soever it could be spared. This interesting particular is, however, effectually suppressed by Lachm. and Alf., who adopt ἐρρίψαν, from MSS. A, B, C, and 15 cursives; to which I can only add Lamb. 1183, Mus. 16, 184, and Cov. 4 (omitted by Mill); though it is evidently, as De Wette says, a Critical alteration to suit ἐποιοῦντο, the Critics stumbling at the change of person, and not having the good taste to see why. All the ancient Versions, except the Vulg., confirm ἐρρίψαμεν, which is restored by Tisch., ed. 2.

20. Now followed several days of continued hardship and anxiety: for no one who has not experienced it, can imagine what is suffered under such circumstances. The strain of both mind and body, and the various other sad circumstances (well described by Conyb. and Hows.) make up a scene of no ordinary anxiety under fatigue and exhaustion. But on the present occasion they were aggravated by such a continued overclouding of the sky, as precluded all chance of taking observations by the heavenly bodies; no stars being visible, and even the disc of the sun not appearing. In such circumstances the ancient navigators were positively lost. Comp. Thucyd. viii. 42, 1, καὶ αὐτῷ ὥστε τε καὶ τὰ ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ ζυγνίφαλα δοῦτα, πλάνησιν τῶν ναῶν ἐν τῷ σκότει καὶ παραχρῆν παρίσχευ, —a graphic description of a whole fleet lost at sea. Under such calamitous circumstances navigators were reduced to the utmost straits; not so much from want of practical skill in navigation, as from being destitute of what a great poet finely calls 'The feeling COMPASS—Navigation's soul.'

—λοιπὸν περιηρεῖτο πᾶσα ἐλπίς.] It was not only the long continuance of the gale, without lulling or abating, but also, as Mr. Smith remarks, the leaky state of the ship,—which would be sure to increase with the continued straining of the timbers,—that deprived them of all hope of being saved.

—κερδῆσαι τ. ὕβριν καὶ τ. ζημίαν.] To explain this seemingly strange expression, it is not necessary, with some, to extend the μὴ to κερδῆσαι, and render κερδ. to suffer. We have only to suppose a sense of the word found in the best writers (see my note on Thucyd. ii. 44; to which I would add Jos. Bell. ii. 3. xx. 32. Philem. frag. vii. 10), lit. 'it behoved you to have hearkened to me, and not to have loosed from Crete; and thus you would have been gainers by all this damage and loss,' i. e. 'you would have avoided it.'

However, Paul's object, as Conyb. observes, in alluding to the correctness of his former advice, is, not to taunt those who had rejected it, but to induce them to give credit to his present assertions. So far from taunting, or even discouraging them, he in the next words, καὶ ταῦν—ἔσται ἐξ ὑμῶν, draws their attention off the past to the present and the future. Καὶ ταῦν, —and as to matters at present now before you,—there shall be no loss, &c. Gladsome news for those who had given up all for lost!

²³ παρίστη γάρ.] Here the Apostle introduces the reason why they may confide in his assurance of entire safety of life to them all, and to bespeak entire credit to his prophetic declaration; and announces himself in the character of one in the service of that God in whom are the issues of life, and from whom has been sent by an angel the assurance in question. Thus the next words, λατρεύω (scil. Θεῷ), and παρέστη ἄγγελος Θεοῦ, are used not so much, as Alf. supposes, 'to give solemnity to the declaration,' but to announce the will of God,—and, as Calv. says, to evince, 'Divinitus probari ipsius causam.'

— διαφερομένων ἡμῶν] Not 'driven about,' as Alf., or 'driven up and down,' as E. V. The sense is, that 'they had been drifting through the sea of Adria;' for our three nautical Authorities are agreed that the motion of the vessel from Clauda to Malta was that of 'drifting,' and in a very nearly straight direction. By 'Ἀδρία' is meant that division of the Mediterranean which lies between Sicily and Malta on the w., and Greece, with Crete, on the e.; in fact, the original 'Ἰόνιον πῆλαγος,' on which see my note on Thucyd. i. 24, τὸν Ἰόνιον κόλπον.—'Υπενούουν—προσάγειν,' they suspected that they were nearing land.' By what indication? Doubtless, as Mr. Smith has shown, by the noise of breakers, which the practised ear of seamen easily recognize, however distant, by their peculiar sound. That the χώραν they were nearing must have been the point of Koura e. of St. Paul's bay, Malta, has been established almost to demonstration by Mr. Smith. In this use of προσάγειν there is a nautical idiom, and a highly graphic expression; similar to ἀναφανίζετε τὴν Κ. supra xxi. 3, in either case originating in the optical illusion, by which, on drawing near to a coast, the land seems to approach to the ship, not the ship to the land. See many examples in my Recens. Syn. By the same idiom our sailors speak of nearing a coast, and fetching a port. In profound ignorance, it would seem, of this not uncommon expression, Lachm. edits, from the single MS. B, προσανίχθαι, thus exchanging what is somewhat difficult for what is utterly unintelligible; so much so, that I doubt not the reading itself arose from a mere error of the scribe (thus forming one among a multitude of slips of this kind to be observed in other instances in this MS.) for προανίχθαι. A Critical alteration, which arose, as we see, from a just view of the form of this χώρα, jutting out into the sea; a sense of προανίχθαι, very rare, but occurring in Jos. B. J. v. 4, 4, τὸ τεῖχος—τοῦ λόφου, καθάπαρ κορυφὴ τις ὑψηλοτέρα προανίχθαι εἰς τρ. πρ. χειρ.

places where breakers are found; see Xen. Anab. iv. 6, 12, and Tab. Ceb. 15. Mr. Smith has ably traced the τραχεῖς τόπους here meant, to certain maral precipices by which the coast of this Point Koura is begirt, and by which a ship which fell on them would be dashed to pieces.

— ἐκπίσωμεν] This (for the text. rec. ἐκπίσωσι) is found in very many MSS. (to which I add all the Lamb. and 3 Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16), confirmed by the ancient Versions, I have received, with all the Critical Editors, from Matthæi downwards.

— ἐκ πρύμνης] However unusual it may now be for anchors to be dropped from the stern of a ship, yet the passages adduced by Weist. and Bp. Pearce show that this was sometimes done in ancient times; though the more usual mode, as in modern times, was by the bow; and, as Mr. Smith has shown, it was only under certain circumstances that the ancients anchored by the stern; and these circumstances did, on this occasion,—beside other reasons, stated by Smith and Conyb.—occur, and thus the ship's way would be more easily arrested, and she would be in a better position to be run ashore next day. Nay, Mr. Smith has shown by the figure of a ship found at Herculaneum, that the ships of the ancients had hawser-holes aft, to fit them for anchoring by the stern, when needed. That the ancient ships used occasionally four anchors, is proved by many examples; and the same practice still prevails in the large merchantmen plying between Alexandria and Constantinople.

— ἤνυχοντο ἡμέραν γενέσθαι] As persons so circumstanced naturally would; and this circumstance very often occurs in accounts of shipwrecks. In the present case they had particular reason to wait for day-light, in order to descry some beach where they might land in safety.

— χαλασάντων τὴν σκάφην] 'having let down, lowered the skiff into the sea.' There is an allusion to the chlain by which it was held on board, and was 'let down.' See note on 2 Cor. xi. 33.

— ἀγκύρας ἐκτείνειν] This phrase (as Mark-land observes) means in effect 'to cast anchor,' since it is by Pollux, i. 9, joined with ἀγκύρας βαλίσθαι. He further remarks, that 'the expression means more than ρίπτειν ἀγκύρας at ver. 29; for in the latter case the sailors had no occasion to leave the vessel; whereas they could not perform the other operation (ἐκταίνειν ἀγκύρας) without going out of the ship by boat.'

31. οὐ δύνασθε] i. e. humanly speaking. For the promise of safety was conditional, and involved the obligation to use the ordinary means for preservation: to neglect which would have been tempting God; see Calvin's able note.

33. These words τεσσαρεσκαδεκάτην—μηδὲν προσλαβόμενοι cannot be meant to express, what would seem at first sight intended to be represented, that the people had fasted for the fourteen days during which the storm had continued; which, without a miracle, would have been impossible; and, as they had provisions in the ship, it would have been quite unnecessary. To remove this perplexity, various expedients have been devised by Expositors ineffectually, and all of them unnecessary, since the best Commentators, from Calvin downwards, have been, with reason, agreed that the words ἄσιτοι διατελεῖτε are not to be pressed on, but regarded as a popular form of expression, merely signifying that their meals had been few or none, food being only caught up interruptedly and irregularly. Besides, as we have seen at v. 21, they had 'little or no appetite' for food, as they were suffering from σειρία. Thus in the records of shipwrecks it is almost always narrated that the sailors scarcely tasted food. The term προσδοκῶντες is meant to point at the principal cause of this inedia, namely, a fearful expectation of the future. Accordingly, it is to be regarded as a participle (for the gerund in Latin) serving to denote cause, as in Thucyd. iv. 68, ἐκ φυγῆς κατίσθησαν φοβηθύντες, i. e. præ metu.

34. πρὸς τῆς ὑμ. σωτ.] A use of πρὸς found only in the best writers, as Thucyd.: 'will make for, tend to, your preservation;' but it is intimated that they must use the means of preservation. And at the same time, by the addition of the next words, Paul turns their thoughts to the Providential care of God, by repeating the assurance (supra 22), but here in more distinct terms, οὐδενὸς γὰρ, &c. The ellipsa. at γὰρ may be thus filled up,—[And you may take courage to partake of food], For not, &c. This is placed beyond doubt by the subsequent words εὐθυμοὶ δὲ γενόμενοι—προσελάβοντο τροφῆς.—To advert to a matter of verbal criticism. For πισσεῖται, MSS. A, B, C, and 11 cursives read ἀπολείται, which is adopted by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. But the authority is insufficient; espec. since internal evidence is not in favour of ἀπολ., which is probably, as Meyer thinks, a correction for an easier reading, suggested by Luke xxi. 18. To suppose πισσ., as Alf. does, a correction to adapt the reading to several passages of the Sept., is highly improbable. As to the Versions adduced for ἀπολ., they are not, in a case like this, of any great weight.

37. For ἡμεν. Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ἡμεῖς, from A, B, and one cursive; and internal evidence is quite in favour of the reading, for this Alexandrian form occurs in Matt. xxiii. 30, in many of the best MSS., and is admitted by all the Critical Editors. But Luke is not Matthew; and I cannot admit the form here until more evidence of cursive MSS. is adduced (for I cannot find a participle), which I doubt not will turn up, when all the cursive MSS. are collated as carefully as the uncials.—The number of persons on board may seem large; but the Alexandrian vessels were very bulky, and fitted out for carrying a very great number of passengers. Thus Josephus, in Vit. c. 3, says the ship in which he sailed, and which was cast away in the Adriatic sea, had 600 persons on board.

38. τὸν σῖτον] meaning, either, as some explain, the wheat, or rather, the ship's provisions, which would be reserved till the last, the lading and lacking being before thrown overboard.

τινα κατεόνου ἔχοντα αἰγιαλόν, εἰς δὲ ἐβουλεύσαντο, εἰ *δύναιτο, ἐξῶσαι τὸ πλοῖον. ⁴⁰ Καὶ τὰς ἀγκύρας περιελόντες εἶον εἰς τὴν θάλασσαν, ἅμα ἀνέντες τὰς ζευκτηρίας τῶν πηδαλίων καὶ ἐπάραντες τὸν ἀρτέμονα τῇ πνεύσῃ, κατεῖχον εἰς τὸν αἰγιαλόν. ⁴¹ Περιπεσόντες δὲ εἰς τόπον διθάλασσον, ἐπώκειλαν ² τὴν ναῦν. καὶ ἡ μὲν πρόρα ἐρείσασα ἔμεινεν ἀσάλευτος, ἡ δὲ

ἔχοντα αἰγιαλόν. As all inlets have shores, Schmid, and Kuin. construe the words thus: κατεόνου αἰγιαλόν ἔχοντα κώπον τινα, 'they perceived a shore having a certain creek.' This, however, is doing violence to the construction. It is best to retain the natural one, and take αἰγ., with Grot., Matthæi, and Schleus., in a popular sense, to denote 'a beach practicable for landing.' And indeed the passages cited by those Commentators prove that αἰγιαλός signifies properly 'a sandy shore' (as opposed to a 'rocky one'), and consequently one convenient for landing; as in Xen. Cyr. vi. 4, 1, λιμὴν αἰγ. ἔχων, and Thucyd. iv. 42. Κώπος is taken in the sense which Theophylact says was usual in the common dialect, viz. an inlet, or creek. This is on the N.W. side of the island, and now called La Cala di San Paolo.—ἐξῶσαι τὸ πλοῖον, 'to strand the vessel.' On this sense of ἐξῶσαι see my note on Thucyd. ii. 90.

—ἀνέντες τὰς ζευκτ. τῶν πηδ.] 'having loosened the bands of the rudders.' So Hdol. iii. 136, τὰ πηδάλια περῖαινε τὴν ναῦν. So Eurip. Hel. 1536, speaks of the rudder as fastened ζευγλαῖαι.—ζευκτηρία comes from the Adject. ζευκτηρίος, which occurs in Æschyl. Pers. 722. With respect to the circumstance, thought strange, of two rudders being used to one ship, to this we have an allusion in the following adage:—'Ἐρίτην χρὴ πρῶτα γινίσθαι, πρὶν πηδαλίοις ἐπιχειρεῖν. And so Theophyl. Com., Νισπτολ. fr. l. 2, ὥσπερ γὰρ ἄκατος οὐδὲ μικρὸν πεῖθεται 'Ὡς πηδαλίω, &c. Perizon. on Ælian, V. H. ix. 40, δύο μὲν πηδάλια ἔχειν τὴν ναῦν, remarks 'that hence it is plain that it was usual and quite ordinary for a ship to have two rudders;' which is by no means so; it is only plain the ship in question, probably of very great burden, had two. And Scheffer and Lips. have proved that the having two was confined to such, and that they were both at the stern. However, the οἰκτες, or πηδάλια, were not like our modern ones; but merely, as Mr. Smith shows, two large paddles, one on each quarter. 'Thus when anchored by the stern, it would be necessary to lift them out of the water, and secure them by lashings, or rudder-bands; and to loose these bands when the ship was again got under way.'

—ἐπάραντες τ. ἀ.] 'having hoisted the arr. to the breeze,' or 'wiud' (as Lucian, Herm. § 25). The term ἀρτέμων, as it rarely occurs, is almost unnoticed by the ancients, and hence its sense is disputed. To omit many false views, suffice it to advert to the best founded—that of Grot., Wets., and others, who understand by it a small sail near the prow, called by Pollux the δόλων, which was used to keep the ship steady in a rough sea, and prevent its working too much, when the larger and upper sails were set. So Juvenal, Sat. xii. 68, 'Vestibus extensis, et quod superaverat unum, Velo prora suo,' where the Scholiast explains, 'artemone solo vellicaverunt.' This view I find confirmed by Mr. Smith, in his 'Dissertation on the Ships of the Ancients,' from which it is placed beyond a doubt that this ἀρτέμων was the small foresail of the ancients, fixed on something resembling a modern bowsprit. 'This sail' (he says) 'was valued principally as an aid in steering, and keeping the head of the vessel true to her course.' All this applies exactly to the ἀρτέμων. 'The mainsail [rather foresail] being hoisted, showed good judgment, though the distance was so small, as it would not only enable them to steer more correctly than without it, but would press the ship further on upon the land, and thus enable them the more easily to get to the shore.'—Penrose.

—κατεῖχον] scil. τὴν ναῦν, 'steered the ship.' It seems to have reference to the steersman holding the tiller firm, as must be done in steering towards any point.

⁴¹ περιπεσόντες εἰς τόπον διθάλ.] Τὸν διθάλ. has not here its usual signification, as said of an isthmus which divides seas, but also of 'a tongue of land running out into the sea,' and consequently washed on two sides by it,—and the word is applied both to 'promontories,' and to 'spits of land jutting out into the sea'—partly above and partly under water—which guide the currents, and therefore make the place διθάλασσον, and consequently rough. So Clemens, cited by Wets., διθάλασσοι καὶ θηριώδεις τόποι, where, for the manifestly corrupt θηριώδεις, I propose to read τραχώδεις, or βραχώδεις, which latter is confirmed by a passage of Dio Chrys. Orat. v., who, speaking of the Syrtis, says they are surrounded by βράχεια καὶ διθάλαττα καὶ ταινίαι. However, from the Admiralty Chart, in Cony. and Hows., and from their explanation, it appears that, at the W. end of St. Paul's bay is 'an island called Salmonetta,' which the sailors could not have known to be such from their place of anchorage. This island is separated from the main land by a channel of about 100 yards wide, communicating with the outer sea. Just within this island, in 'all probability, was the place where the ship struck.' The discrepancy may indeed be accounted for between St. Luke's account and the Admiralty Chart, by the view involving an optical deception on the sailors. But it is not improbable that this islet was, in the time of St. Paul, united to the mainland; and thus there would be a τόνος διθάλασσοι, or 'isthmus,' at the very place where the channel of 100 yards' width at present is.

—ἐρείσασα] 'having fixed itself.' On this idiom, by which words with an active sense, and generally active us, have sometimes a reflexive sense, see Matthias, Gr. Gr. p. 521. This idiom is the more to be attended to, since for want of knowing it, or, at least, remembering it, the greatest Critics have occasionally erred. Thus in Æschyl. Agam. 974, ὅσους γὰρ γαίτων ὁμότοιχος ἰραίδει, the sense (unperceived by all the Editors) must undoubtedly be, 'the disease has fixed itself [with me]; taken its post with me, as a fellow-occupier of the same house, or one under the same roof.'

— ἰμειν δσάλυτος] Priscus compares Virg. Æn. v. 206, 'Illiaque prora pendit.'

— ἀλύετο] 'was severed,' broken asunder. So solvitur in a similar passage of Virg. Æn. x. 363. The very circumstance often occurs in shipwrecks, where, from the violence of the surge, the vessel parts asunder, the poop separating from the rest.

XXVIII. 1. Μελίτη] It was an old opinion, strenuously supported in the last century by De Rhoer and Ignacio Georgi, that this is not the African Melita, but another, on the coast of Illyrium. And it has of late been revived, and ably maintained by Bryant, Coleridge, and others. Yet it is, I conceive, utterly untenable, for various reasons, pointed out by Scaliger, Bochart, Cluverius, and espec. by Major Rennell,—and last, not least, by Mr. Smith.

2. οἱ δὲ βάρβαροι] The pride of the Greeks accounted men of all other nations barbarians, just as the Chinese now do. The not being able to speak the languages of those countries involved the charge of barbarism; nay, many have supposed that such was the primitive import of the word βάρβαρος, maintaining that the term originally referred only to difference of language, but afterwards to difference of manners. See the note on 1 Cor. xiv. 11. As to the etymology of the word, which may help to settle the question, it is not derived from the Arab. berber, 'to murmur'; or, as Strabo thinks, xiv. 662, from an imperfect pronunciation, but from the Punic barber, 'a shepherd,' and being originally appropriated to the pastoral αὐτόχθονες of North Africa,—who, to their more civilized fellow-men on the other side of the Mediterranean, appeared rustics,—the term βάρβαρος came at length to mean simply a rustic, as it may here be best taken. At any rate, they might be termed βάρβαροι on the ground that the Φοίνικες, by whom the island was colonized, were always regarded as almost κατ' ἔξοχον, βάρβαροι.

— ἀνάψ.] Lachm. and Alf. (not Tisch.) read ἀψ., from A, B, C, and 4 cursives;—authority quite insufficient; especially since internal evidence is equally balanced; for ἀνάψ. might be, as Alford says, 'a correction to a more precise term; or the Preposition in composition might be lost through the carelessness of scribes.' See note supra xxv. 21. But the latter is, from the state of external evidence, the more probable opinion. This use of πυρὰν where we should expect πῦρ, is an idiom of the ordinary Greek dialect. I am still of opinion that the literal sense is, 'having set fire to a pile of fagots;' as in Hdod. i. 86, πυρὴ ἤδη ἀμύληται. Athen. p. 12, ὁπάσαι τὴν πυρὰν. 2 Macc. i. 22, ἀνέφθη πυρά. Judith vii. 5, ἀνακαίσαντες πυράς. In this version there is something more appropriate, for an immense pyre would be necessary to warm so many persons.

— προσελβ. π. ἡμ.] 'received us to their society and hospitality,' as in Philem. 12, 17.

— Ἐφεστῶτα is simply for ἐπικείμενον, supra xxvii. 10. Comp. Polyb. p. 1053, ὥστε, διὰ τὸν ἐφεστῶτα ζῶφον, μηδὲ τοῦτο ἐν ποσὶ δύνασθαι θλίπειν.

3. συστρίψαντες] 'when he had heaped together.' Comp. Hdod. i. 86, συνήσας πυρὴν. There is something γραφικὸν in the term, (so Heysch., οἱ γυφάεις ἀκαθῶν σαρὸν συστρίψαντες,) probably one of the ordinary Greek terms for συλλέγ., in Xen. An. iv. 3, 11, φρύγανα συλλέγοντες ὡς ἐπὶ πῦρ.

— The τι prefixed to πλήθος by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from A, B, C, and 2 or 3 cursives (to which I can only add Cov. 2, omitted by Mill), is probably, but not certainly, genuine.

— ἐκ τῆς θέρμης] The ἀπὸ, edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from A, B, C, G, H, and 20 cursives (I add Lamb. 1184, Mus. 16184, and Cov. 2, omitted by Mill, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16), is a very specious, but nevertheless false reading, which arose from Critics, who thought ἀπὸ more suitable! but only from misunderstanding the forcible and entirely graphic expression διεξελθ. ἐκ τ. π., which is 'issuing out through (a crevice) in the pile.' The ἀπὸ was adopted by those who thought the sense was 'on account of the fire;' which, however, would quite spoil the beauty of the expression.

—καθήψε] Hellenistic Greek for Classical καθήψατο, found in some MSS. by correction.
 It is, however, sometimes found in the later Class. writers, as Epict. Diss. iii. 29, τοῦ αὐχίνος καθάπτειν, 'fastening on his neck.' It was likely that any one so occupied should be bitten by a viper, since serpents are oft. found in brushwood. So we read in Palladius Lausiaca, 20, πλησίον θυνῶν (rushes) καὶ φρυγάνων, ἐκτὶ κειμένω, ὑπὸ ἀσπίδος ἰδύχθη. That the reptile did really bite the Apostle's hand, is proved by the expression at ver. 4, κρεμάμενον ἐκ τῆς χειρὸς α. For how can a serpent hang by any part of a man's body, except with its teeth? As to the other fancy of the rationalists, that the serpent was not venomous, it is quite forbidden by the fact, that the natives standing by felt assured that Paul would not survive the bite; which could only be from their well knowing the serpent to be venomous. Indeed, the term ἰχθὺνα is never used of any serpent but the viper, which is, I believe, always venomous.

4. τὸ θηρίον] The word is here used, not of beasts properly so called, but of serpents; though it properly means any wild creature; yet Galen uses the word Theriaca to denote 'medicines to cure the bite of a serpent.'

—φονεύς ἐστὶν ὁ ἄνθ.] Why they should have fixed upon murder, rather than any other crime drawing down Divine vengeance, is not said. Many Commentators think they concluded it from the viper seizing his hand; which, as being the offending member, was, by the lex talionis, to be visited with punishment; in like manner as the right hand of parricides used to be cut off. A law this, which the Greeks and Romans not only constantly acted on themselves, in apportioning punishment to crime, but on which they also supposed the Deity to act.
 Yet the idea is one too far-fetched to occur to rude barbarians, who would only reason thus:
 'The man will surely die, and no doubt for some crime worthy of death; and considering that he has been thus rescued from the jaws of a watery grave, and brought here to suffer death, surely he must have been guilty of the greatest of all crimes,—murder.' From the Class. citations of Grot., Pricæus, and Wetst., it appears that the ancients held the opinion that Divine justice (here called ἡ δίκη) sometimes delivered criminals out of dangers, in order to reserve them for heavier calamities and severer punishments.

Here there is no reason to suppose (with many eminent Commentators) that by ἡ δίκη is meant the Goddess of Justice, Nemesis. Instead of Deification, we have merely a Rhetorical personification, as in Hor. Od. i. 35, 17: 'To semper anteit æva Necessitas Clavos trabales et cuneos manu Gestans ævæ,' where the attribute of justice is personified by a Nemesis, as in Soph.
 Antig. 538, ἀλλ' οὐκ ἴδασι τοῦτό γ' ἡ δίκη σ'.
 See also Pind. Olym. xiii. 6. Eur. Hipp. 471.

6. πίμπρασθαι, ἡ κατ., &c.] Here are represented the two kinds of symptoms, which supervene on the bite of a poisonous serpent, according to the virulence of the poison, and the strength of the body to which it is communicated. The first represents the swelling, and inflammation, in the beginning local, then general; which brings on a burning fever, that quickly destroys the patient. So Lucian, Dips. 4, ὄφεις ἰκκαίει—καὶ πίμπρασθαι ποιεῖ. Æli. Anim.
 iii. 18. The second is the effect of the strongest poison on the weakest body.

—μηδὲν ἄτοπον εἰς αὐτὸν γ.] This phrase is Hellenistic in its character, and corresponds to ἔπαθεν οὐδὲν κακόν just before. Ἄτοπον often
 as here, corporeal.

7. τῷ πρώτῳ τῆς νήσου] I agree with Conyb.
 and Alf. that this was probably the official title;
 especially since 'Publius can hardly have borne the appellation from his estates, during his father's lifetime. Two inscriptions have been found in Malta, at Citta Vecchia, which seem to establish this view: a Greek one, containing the words
 α(υλοῦ) κ(αστρι)κιος κυρ. προυνδιν ἱππενρ ῥωμ πρωτος μελιταιιν και πατρων αρχας και αμφικπολευς α σ (Αὐγούστου σισβαστῶ) θιω
 . . . , and a Latin one with the same title,
 "Mel. Primus."

—ἀναδεξάμενος—ἐξένισεν] 'having taken us to his house, kindly entertained us.' Avad. for ὑποδ. Ælian, as cited by Wetst.—Ζηνίζειν and
 φιλ. are usual terms on this subject.

8. πυρετοῖς] The plural is here, as often, used in a singular sense, like febres in Latin.

Παῦλος εἰσελθὼν, καὶ προσευξάμενος, ἐπιθείς τὰς χεῖρας αὐτῷ, ἰάσατο αὐτόν. ⁹ Τούτου οὖν γενομένου, καὶ οἱ λοιποὶ, οἱ ἔχοντες ἀσθενείας ἐν τῇ νήσῳ, προσήρχοντο καὶ ἐθεραπεύοντο· ¹⁰ οἱ καὶ πολλαῖς τιμαῖς ἐτίμησαν ἡμᾶς, καὶ ἀναγομένους ἐπέθεντο τὰ πρὸς τὴν χρεῖαν.

It may, however, be supposed to have reference to those paroxysms by which fever makes its attacks. And possibly the θίρμαι ἰσχυραὶ of Thucydides ii. 49, may be explained on the same principle. Συνέχισθαι is a term usually applied to attacks of fever; see note on Mark i. 30; and Ammian. Marc. i. 26.

— δυσεντερία] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read —ω, from A, B, G, H, and 10 cursives (I add Lamb. 1185, Mus. 5588, 11,876, and Cov. 2, 3, and 5, omitted by Mill); and others may be found to have the same reading, since ω and α are so often confounded by scribes. Internal evidence is in favour of —ω. The word was likely to be used by Luke; since it was, as we find from Meris and the Lex. Rhét. of Bekker, the ordinary Greek term for the Attic δυσεντερία. The existence of —ω is also attested by Gloss. Gr. δυσεντήμιον, tormina, and Etym. Mag. p. 494, 32. Nevertheless, I cannot find a single example of the word in any Greek writer; and —ια was used by writers not Attic, as Polyb. Hence I suspect that the reading —ω crept in from the scribes, to whom the Neuter form might be well known, and who therefore would easily mistake α for ω.

10. πολλαῖς τιμαῖς ἐτίμησαν ἡμᾶς] Many of the best Commentators are of opinion, that τιμαῖς is here to be taken in a sense frequent in the Classical writers, and not unknown in the Scriptures, to denote honorary rewards. So Eccles. xxxviii. 1, τίμα λατρὸν πρὸς τὰς χρεῖας τιμαῖς αὐτοῦ as Jos. Antt. iv. 6, 8, τίμας τινα ξειρίοις. Diod. Sic. iv. 29, Ἑρακλῆα δωρεαῖς ἐτίμησαν. The sense seems to be,—‘they showed their respect, namely, by honorary presents’ of necessities for the voyage. The words following seem meant to give an example of the kind of presents made, and the liberality thereof. Ἐπὶθέντο is well explained by Wetst., ‘onerarunt nos, et cumulata ingesserunt,’ referring to Ruth iii. 15. And thus our Common Version, formed on those of Wycliffe and Tyndale, is not to be disapproved of. Pearce, Newc., and others, were not aware that in our own language lode and load are occasionally used in this very figurative sense, as we say ‘heaping on gifts, favours, or benefits.’ Such is its use in Shakespeare, Cymb. i. 6, “I chiefly, that set thee on this desert, am bound to load thy merit (i. e. thee for this merit) richly.” By πρὸς τὴν χρεῖαν is denoted ‘the bestowal of such honorary presents as they thought fit to confer in return for the benefits received.’ Comp. Hom

Odd. xxiv. 284, σ’ εὐ δώροισιν ἀμειψάμενοι—Καὶ ξενίᾳ ἀγαθῇ, where ξεν. ἀγ. may have reference to presents of provisions, and other necessities for the voyage; as δώροισιν to the more honorary presents of vestments, arms, &c. For τὴν χρεῖαν, Lachm. and Tisch. edit τὰς χρεῖας from 2 uncial and 5 cursive MSS., which may seem confirmed from xx. 34, ταῖς χρεῖαις μου, and Rom. xii. 13, ταῖς χρεῖαις τῶν ἀγίων; but the reading probably arose from alteration from those who thought the Plur. would be more suitable; though Alford thinks τὴν χρεῖαν was an alteration from Phil. iv. 16. At any rate there is no authority sufficient to justify change.

11. πλ.—Ἀλεξ., παρασήμῳ Διοσκ.] Παρασ., ‘by’ or ‘at’ (= ‘with’), ensign of Diosc., Διοσκ., being a Dat. of apposition, instead of a Genit.; or rather, Διοσκουροῖς was the inscription itself, i. e. ‘dedicated to the Dioscuri.’ The παρασῆμον was a painting, or bas-relief, on the prow, of some god or hero, or sometimes animal; nay, even inanimate substance, as shield, &c.; see Ovid. Trist. i. 10, 1, and Virg. Æn. v. 115, seqq. The poop bore the picture or image—called the tutela—of the god, under whose protection the ship was supposed to be placed. Both the tutela and the insigne were of richly gilt metal, ivory, or other rich material. So Virg. Æn. x. 171, ‘Et aurato fulgebant Apoline puppis.’ Aristoph. Ach. 493, παλλαδίων χρυσουμένων. Thus of the ship mentioned in the above-cited passage of Ovid, the navem tutelare was Minerva, placed on the poop; but the insigne, ensign, or παρασῆμον, was a helmet of Minerva painted on the prow; and this gave name to the ship. Yet such was not the invariable custom. Sometimes the tutela and the παρασῆμον were the same; as, for instance, whenever the effigies of the Deity himself, to whose protection the ship was committed, supplied the place of an insigne, then the ship was called by the name of that god, who was painted or carved on the prow. Thus the Alexandrian ship in which Paul sailed had the Dioscuri for an insigne as well as a tutela; whence it was inscribed Διοσκουροῖς.

13. περιελθόντες] The Common Version, ‘having fetched a compass,’ however homely a phrase, well expresses the sense, the meaning of that obsolete expression being, ‘having taken a circuitous course,’ namely, by being obliged to tack, in consequence of an adverse wind, and beat to windward.

14. εὐρόντες ἀδελφ.] By whom they had been converted we know not; but since Puteoli was the great emporium for the Alexandrian corn vessels, the constant communication between Alexandria and Puteoli could scarcely fail to spread the knowledge of the Gospel, and introduce Christian brethren as sojourners and even residents at Puteoli.

— παρεκλήθημεν—ἑπτὰ] 'we were entreated to stay seven days.' It is probable that they had arrived there on the day after the Lord's day. Hence they were requested to stay the next Lord's day over, to give an opportunity to all the Christians of hearing Paul's preaching. See note on Gal. i. 18.

15. εἰς ἀπᾶντ. ἡμῖν ἄχρις Ἀ.] The distance (51 miles) marks the profound respect paid to Paul by the Roman Christians, to whom he had sent his celebrated Epistle four years before.

— Τριῶν ταβερνῶν] These are supposed to have been inns for the refreshment of travellers passing to and from Rome; but they were probably rather retail shops for the sale of all sorts of eatables and drinkables. Thus Zosimus, ii. 10, calls them the τρία καπηλεῖα; and, indeed, this was the usual sense of taberna.

— οὗς ἰδὼν—εὐχ. τῷ Θεῷ ἔλαβε θάρσος] The 'thanking God' is put first, and then the 'taking courage.' Paul thanked God that the object of his long wishes of seeing the Roman Christians, to whom he had some time before written, had been granted him, however in bonds. Paul had long ago thanked God for them (Rom. i. 8), though only on report of them; now he thanked God at seeing them,—seeing both their personal piety and their affectionate devotion to him. Hence he took courage from their society, and encouragement as to the great work he had long contemplated of preaching the Gospel at Rome. We are, however, to bear in mind that even this θάρος was God's gift, through his instruments; for, as Calv. well remarks, although Paul was endued with invincible fortitude, so as least of all to depend on human helps, 'Deus tamen, qui suos humanitatis confirmare solet, novum illi vigorem hoc modo subiecit,' the effect of which would be very enduring; for, as the same able Expositor adds, 'how often when lonely, sick, and in prison, and ready to despond, would the remembrance of this happy meeting brace up his courage; recalling his happiness on reflecting how many pious converts there were at Rome, but more or less weak, whom he should stablish, strengthen, settle!'

16. παρέδωκε, &c.] It was ordered by law that all persons sent as prisoners to Rome should be delivered to the custody of the Præfectus Prætorio, and guarded in the Prætorian camp. Luke has, indeed, here expressed himself with extreme brevity, but his meaning seems to be this:—'The Centurion delivered his prisoners to the charge of the Prefect, [by whom] it was permitted to Paul,' &c. — καθ' ἑαυτὸν, i. e. 'apart from the other prisoners,' who were confined in the carcer castræ. A great favour this: for even those to whom the libera custodia, or φυλακή ἀδισμος, was granted, were yet usually confined in a part of the public prison called the δεσμοτήριον ἱλυυδριον.

— σὺν τῷ φυλ. α. σ.] And, as appears from v. 20, and according to the invariable custom of persons kept in such sort of durance, chained by the hand to a soldier. Nay, from Joseph. Ant. xviii. 7, 6, we find that even king Agrippa, when in confinement at Rome, was chained to a soldier.

17. τοὺς ὄντας τῶν Ἰουδ. πρώτους] Meaning, not the Rulers of the synagogue, but, in a general way, 'those of the Jews who were the principal persons;' so the Pesch. Syr. Version.

— ἔλεγε πρ. α.] In this skillful address to the leading persons only, Paul, desirous of removing any false impressions that might have been made on the Romans by letter or messages from their countrymen at home, contents himself with detailing the true reason why he had been sent a prisoner to Rome; so as thereby to remove any unfavourable impression that they might have contracted as to his character. Propriety as to the sequence of the tenes requires that we should render (as is done in the Syr. Version), 'though having done' = 'I had done.'—ἐναντίον must be accommodated in sense to the two clauses to which it belongs,—namely, 'nothing injurious to the Jewish people, or at variance with their religion or institutions.' Conf. supra xxvi. 3, τῶν—ἰδὼν καὶ ζητημάτων, where see note.

n ch. 26. 11. ὑπάρχειν ἐν ἐμοί. 19ⁿ Ἀντιλεγόντων δὲ τῶν Ἰουδαίων, ἡναγκάσθην ἐπικαλέσασθαι Καίσαρα, οὐχ ὥς τοῦ ἔθνους μου ἔχων τι κατηγορήσαι. 20^o Διὰ ταύτην οὖν τὴν αἰτίαν παρεκάλεσα ὑμᾶς ἰδεῖν καὶ προσλαλήσαι· ἔνεκεν γὰρ τῆς ἐλπίδος τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ τὴν ἄλυσιν ταύτην περικείμεαι. 21 Οἱ δὲ πρὸς αὐτὸν εἶπον Ἠμεῖς οὔτε γράμματα περὶ σοῦ ἐδεξάμεθα ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰουδαίας, οὔτε παραγενόμενός τις τῶν ἀδελφῶν ἀπήγγειλεν ἡ ἐλάλησέ τι περὶ σοῦ πονηρόν. 22^p Ἀξιοῦμεν δὲ παρὰ σοῦ ἀκοῦσαι ἂ φρονεῖς· περὶ μὲν γὰρ τῆς αἰρέσεως ταύτης γνωστόν ἐστιν ἡμῖν ὅτι^q ἡ πανταχοῦ ἀντιλέγεται. 23^r Ταξάμενοι δὲ αὐτῷ ἡμέραν, ἦκον πρὸς αὐτὸν εἰς τὴν ξενίαν πλείονες· οἷς ἐξετίθετο διαμαρ-

19. οὐχ ὥς—κατηγορήσαι] meaning to intimate, that the course he had taken in this appeal to Rome was purely a defensive one on his part, and not resorted to from any purpose of making complaint against his nation.

20. παρεκάλεσα ὑμ.] lit. 'I have called for you;' seemingly an idiom of the ordinary Greek for 'I have called you to come to me.'—ἔνεκεν γάρ. The γάρ refers to a clause omitted; q. d. '[And I may justly claim to be free from all offence to my nation, even to be attached to it,] for, for the hope of Israel (i. e. the long-expected Messiah) am I in bonds;' meaning, that he had come into imprisonment alone through his full faith in God's promised deliverance of his people through the Messiah. See supra xxvi. 6, and note.

21. οὔτε γράμμ. κ. σ. ἰδεξ., &c.] It may seem scarcely credible that they had received no intelligence concerning Paul, either by letter, or by personal communication from Jews who had come to Rome. But Meyer and others have shown that it might be true, that they had had no letters or information concerning Paul from the Jews at home; and for several reasons—stated by Conyb. and Alf.—it might be true, that they had had no tidings of the position in which Paul had been placed by his appeal. Yet there is something obscure and not straightforward in the mode of expression at least of this verse; in which I am still of opinion that the latter of the two clauses is meant to explain the former; so that the general sense to be collected from both is this.—'We have neither received letters from Judea, nor personal communication from our brethren there, which express any evil done by thee.' They could not be in ignorance of Paul's professing Christianity (for that they might infer from v. 20); and, accordingly, their mode of speaking was only an indirect way of letting Paul know that they did not regard that profession as of itself involving any thing morally wrong.—In the words following (v. 22), ἀξιοῦμεν δὲ παρὰ σοῦ ἀκοῦσαι ἂ φρονεῖς, there is a shy mode of speaking, but courteously intended to give the Apostle an opportunity of urging what he had to say in defence of this novel religion; which would seem to need it, since it was every where evil spoken of. Of this use of αἰρέσις, as said of the Christian religion, I find an example in an Epistle of Constantine the Great, adduced in Routh's Reliq. Sacr. t. iv. p. 301.

23. ταξ.—ἡμέραν] lit. 'having agreed with (by a mutual arrangement) for a day.'

—ἦκον—εἰς τὴν ξενίαν πλ.] 'very many went to him at his ξενίαν,' by which almost all Expositors understand 'lodging,' i. e. the μίσθωμα at v. 30; but then, why should not Luko have used here the plain term μίσθωμα? Besides, at this very early period Paul would hardly have obtained a settled μίσθωμα. Moreover, the sense they assign to ξεν. here is very unusual; and as to the examples they adduce, Philom. 22, and Jos. Anti. v. 28, will not prove it. The former passage is, at any rate, doubtful; and in the latter the sense manifestly is, hospitium, denoting 'the temporary residence of a guest with a host,' as is quite clear from the context; and such is the constant use of the word in the Class. writers. In short, Olsh. and Wieseler have well shown that a distinction is to be made between the two terms (the very distinction observed by the Class. writers), so that by μίσθ. is meant 'a hired lodging,' used as a permanent residence, and ξενίαν 'a temporary residence of a guest with a friend,' as in Philom. 22. Whether, however, the ξενία was, as Olsh. and Wieseler think, the house of Aquila and Priscilla, is, to say the least, uncertain.—Οἷς ἐξετίθετο, 'to whom he set forth,' 'laid before them.'—τὴν βασ. τ. θ., 'the principles of the Christian religion.' The term διαμαρτ. denotes strong attestation and open declaration of the truth of the religion, compare supra xx. 21 and 24, and the next term πείθων denotes the earnest moral suasion which was employed to work on their wills; the whole (as the words express) accompanied with arguments drawn from their own Scriptures, both the historical and prophetic parts thereof. The result is set forth in the next words, expressive of division of sentiment, and ending probably in the separation of the dissidents, and the departure of both classes,—immediately after Paul had uttered one saying (for such is the sense of ἐκόντος τοῦ Π. ἐν ῥήματι). In the introductory words of warning, ὑμῶν is read by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from A. B. and 20 cursives (to which I add Trin. Coll. B. x. 16, and Cov. 2, omitted by Mill). Internal evidence is in its favour; and, being strongly supported by the ancient Versions, it is probably the genuine reading; especially since it has an important bearing on the case in point. The ὑμῶν, however, was not an 'alteration to conform it to Paul's being a Jew,' as Alf., or to distinguish

him from Jews, as Meyer supposes; but simply arose from the negligence of scribes, who perpetually confound ἡμ. and ὑμ. The passage from Isa. vi. 9, 10, with which Paul gave emphasis to his solemn warning, is the very one with which our Lord commenced his teaching by parables,—a passage more frequently quoted in the New Test. than any other passage of the Old. On the words themselves see note on Matt. xiii. 14, 15.

²⁸. γνωστὸν οὖν ἔστω ὑμῖν] A solemn and earnest form of bidding any one take note, occurring supra ii. 14. iv. 10. xiii. 38.—Before τὸ σω. τοῦ Θεοῦ, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. insert τούτου, from A, B, and 8 cursives; to which I add Lamb. 1184, and Cov. 2, omitted by Mill. But, specious as the reading is, as seeming to add force to the declaration (and so Alf.), yet I suspect that it came from the Versions, where it was expressed to give greater point to the declaration. As to the force imparted by the τούτου, the declaration does not need it; as will appear from Luke ii. 30. iii. 6, and notes. Besides, τὸ σωτ. does not mean, as Alf. explains, 'the message of salvation,' but 'the means and opportunity for obtaining it,' παρὰ Θεοῦ, as the offer

²⁹. This verse is omitted in A, B, and some 6 cursives, and is cancelled by Griesb., Lachm., and Tisch., and also by Alf., who thinks it was inserted on account of the abrupt transition from v. 28 to v. 30; though he acknowledges that 'it may, perhaps, after all, have been omitted as seeming superfluous after v. 25.' For my own part, I have no doubt that it was removed for that very cause; and that, having been omitted in some copies of the Syr. and Italic copies, it was left out in some Greek copies, which, as B and partly A, are found to Latinize. It is also absent from certain copies of the Syr. None of the Vulgate copies are without it.

^{30, 31}. ἐμείνε — κηρύσσων τὴν βασ. τοῦ Θεοῦ] Thus we see was fulfilled Paul's long cherished desire to preach the Gospel at Rome also (Rom. i. 15), τὸ κατ' ἐμὲ πρόθυμον εὐαγγελίσασθαι, and thus is brought to a suitable conclusion the Apostle's history; as far, at least, as it has been directly revealed. The thread of the Sacred narrative is thus, I would say, not suddenly broken off, but rather spun out ; though at any rate we are not in a position to know the actual reason why the Sacred narrative was made to terminate at this point. The German Theologians, however, as might be expected, abound, nay, superabound, in conjectures why and wherefore . Those who are fond of such cates may find them in Davidson's Introduction, or in Alford's note.

EXCURSUS I. ON MATTHEW VIII. 28.

Ἱερουσαλὴμ] On carefully re-considering the whole of the questio vesata concerning the true reading here, and the real topographical position of the country mentioned here and in the parallel Gospels, I have seen reason to alter my former opinion. In touching on the two points at issue, I shall consider the latter first, since it will pave the way to a more sure determination of the former. I must now abandon my opinion as to the site of the ancient Gadara, being not, what has been supposed, at Omkeis. That the real site thereof can be no other than Omkeis, is evident from the exact description of that situation given by Seitz, Burckhardt, Captains Irby and Mangles, Mr. Madden, Col. Napier, and Lord Lindsay: for, as to the argument grounded on Pliny's fixing it præfluente Hieromax, that will not preclude Omkeis from being the site of Gadara, since it is described by Col. Napier as 'situated on the precipitous ascent of one side of a deep gorge' [between the Hippos and the Anti-hippos, and, according to the best Maps, not much more than $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile from the Hieromax, nay, from the steepness of the declivity, seeming almost close to it (see note on ver. 30, μακρὸν)]. As to my reason grounded on the designation on the coins of Gadara, that has little force, considering that the coins were meant not for the city only, but the state of Gadara (i. e. the Gadarene), which included a considerable range of the Lake-coast, and its only port Gamala. As to Origen attesting that the hot-baths of Ἀμαθὰ were in the vicinity, that proves nothing against Omkeis being Gadara, since the baths in question are in the immediate vicinity of Omkeis. Nor will the passage I have adduced from Eusebius prove Omkeis not to be the ancient Gadara, —at least, after allowing for the indefinite terms used by that writer, who seems to have been imperfectly informed of its exact situation. After reading (as I formerly proposed to do) ἐν τῷ ὄρει (meaning the Anti-hippos) οὐ πρὸς ὑπερσλαίς τὰ τῶν θερμῶν ὑδάτων παρακείμεται, the sense will be, 'at whose foot (lit. skirts) lie adjacent the Baths of the hot-waters,' i. e. 'the Baths called Hot-waters.' Now this site cannot be any other than that of the town of Amatha (so called from the Hebr. חמא, 'to be hot'), answering to the present Hammel (meaning 'hot-springs'), which is, however, placed, even in our best Maps, on the wrong side of the Hieromax, as is plain from Capt. Irby's statement, who, after describing Amatha as a small ancient town, containing nothing of interest, and making no mention of the hot-baths (which, however, Mr. Madden attests are yet to be seen, though probably out of the town, and seemingly out of Capt. Irby's way to Omkeis), then subjoins: 'From this point we ascended the mountains (rather, mountain-range) by a very steep road (nothing said about crossing the Hieromax, a deep, wide, and rapid stream), and before sun-set we arrived at Omkeis.' This is also quite clear from the following words of Anton. Martyr. Itiner. (cited by Reland in his Description of Palestine): 'Transivimus Jordanem in ipso loco, et venimus in civitatem quæ vocatur Gaddi. In parte ipsius civitatis, milliario tertio, sunt aquæ calidæ, quæ appellantur Thierma Helim.' And again, further on: 'Ibi est etiam fluvius calidus qui dicitur Gadarra, et descendit torrens, et intrat Jordanem; et ex ipso ampliatur Jordanes et major fuit (read ful). Now there can be no doubt that the traveller meant thus to describe both Gadara, Amatha, and the river Hieromax; though he strangely confounds the names, ascribing to the river the name of the city. And so Origen, vol. i. 239, mentions Gadara as a city πρὸς ἣν ('about which') τὰ διαφόντα θερμὰ πύχνα. By milliario tertio Anton. means reckoning from the ford of Gamala; though the distance is, in fact, about four. By 'fluv. calidus' he evidently means the Hieromax; but calidus is an epithet unsuited to any river, inasmuch that it cannot be right. Read gelidus, an epithet frequently applied to rivers, and very suitable to the Hieromax, whose stream, being fed from the mountain-springs of the Hippos and Anti-hippos, must be cold.

As respects the distance of Gadara from Gamala, that will in some measure depend on what part of Gadara we measure from, to either of those places. And that the city occupied an extensive site, we may infer from Lord Lindsay's account, where he says, 'that the city extended w. over an even piece of ground lying at the foot of the hill, and that its length (qu. ? 'breadth') from the hill [across] was about half an hour, equiv. to a mile and a half.' From this account we may better understand what Antoninus meant when he described the Thierma as 'in parte ipsius civitatis,' by which we may understand at a distant part of it, at one end or side of it, viz. at the river, and consequently on the left, not right, bank of the Hieromax. That the ruins in question can be those of no other than Gadara, is also plain from the description given by Captains Irby and Mangles, and Col. Napier, which states the walls as yet quite discernible, and within them the pavement of the main streets still very perfect, and the marks of chariot-wheels on the stones. This is still further confirmed by their attesting the existence of a row of columns lining the main street on either side, and two Theatres, in tolerable preservation, within the walls — and out of them to the N. (qu. ? N.E.) a necropolis, of which the sepulchres are all subterranean, and hewn out of the rock. That this situation must be that of Gadara, is confirmed by the description of Gadara by Epiphanius. adv. Her. L. i. p. 181, who relates that in the neighbourhood of Gadara were caves cut out of the rock, burying-grounds, and tombs. But the great distance of the tombs, &c., six or seven miles from the nearest part of the Lake, forbids us to suppose that they were the tombs tenanted by the demoniac, or that the transaction recorded in Matt. viii. 28—34, and the other Evangelists, could have taken place at or near Gadara. They must have occurred at some place not far from the coast of the Lake, and near to which was the πόλις to which the swine-herds went, to relate the event that had happened, and to which the demoniac belonged. Now that could not, as we see, be Gadara. What, then, was it? Now Origen, after mentioning Gadara in terms quite agreeing with the above description, and justly rejecting that city as the scene of the transaction in question, adverts to Gergesa as the probable situation, describing it as πόλις ἀρχαία περὶ τὴν λίμνην περὶ ἣν κριμὸς παρακείμενος τῇ λίμνῃ, ἀφ' οὗ δεικνύται τοῦτ' χοίρους ὑπὸ τῶν δαιμόνων καταβεβλήσθαι, where for πρὸς ἡν κρ. (which cannot be right), I would read παρὰ ἧς. Thus the sense he meant to express is, that 'the spot where the transaction, of the swine hurled down the precipice, took place, was yet pointed out in his time at a steep rock which overhangs the Lake, and that thereabouts was the ancient city Gergesa.' In fact, Jerome living a century later, speaks in his Onomasticon (on Gen. xv.) of Gergesa as yet in existence, though doubtless very much in ruins. His words are: 'Gergesæ insiderant Gadaræ et Gergesæ finitimam regionem,' thus recognizing Gadara and Gergesa as separate, and yet their respective districts as forming one common territory. Moreover, besides the testimony of Origen and Jerome to this effect, we have that of Eusebius, a very little time after Origen, who in his work de Locis Sacris (Palestine), in v. Γέργισσα, attests that a town or village called Gergesa was pointed out, on a mountain near the Lake of Tiberias. That mountain I believe to be the Anti-hippos. And although Jerome adopts (from the Italic) Gerginorum as the text in all three Gospels, yet he remarks in his Commentary that Gergesa was the place where our Lord exorcised the demons. Hence we are warranted in conjecturing that Gergesa and Gerasa were no other than two different modes of writing the same name; Gerasa (probably at first Geresa) having arisen only from a careless pronunciation of Gergesa. The name of the country was, it seems, originally, ἡ χώρα τῶν Γεργισσηνῶν, and afterwards, from the cause just adverted to, Γερασσηνῶν, as found in Epiphanius, or Γερασαίων. As to Γαδαρηνῶν, which nearly all the recent Editors read here, as well as in Mark and Luke, they have done so only because it was, they thought, more agreeable to custom; forgetting that in Luke viii. 27, ἀνὴρ ἐκ τῆς πόλεως must, if Γαδαρηνῶν be read in the preceding verse, mean no other than Gadara; which, however, as we have seen, is not permitted by the situation of the place.

To advert to the true reading here, this cannot be what Lachm. edits, Γερασ.—since that is wholly destitute of authority from MSS.—nor Γαδαρ., which Tisch. edits,—and that both from insufficiency of authority and of internal evidence. Nothing remains but that the third be adopted, on almost as strong evidence as can be desired,—namely, all the MSS. except 8 (2 of them only 2 in.), 4 Evangelaria, and one Lamb. MS., confirmed by the Sahid., Æthiop., Arab., and other Versions. Now against such overwhelming external authority, what is there to be opposed that might warrant our adopting either one of the other two readings as the genuine text of St. Matthew? Why merely this,—that the reading Γεργισσηνῶν arose from a mere conjecture of Origen,—in short, a fabrication of the good Father. But this is taking for granted, what, for the credit of a name so illustrious, ought to be proved; whereas there exists not even a shadow of probability. How can we suppose that Origen would have had influence sufficient to introduce his conjecture into all the MSS., but a very few, of both the Western and the Eastern Churches? Assuredly we are not warranted in disturbing a reading so strongly supported as Γεργισ. in St. Matthew's Gospel, especially considering that we can easily account for Γαδαρ., as introduced by Revisers from the other two Gospels. Just as in the passages of Mark and Luke a few copies have Γεργ., from

St. Matthew's Gospel. On the whole, my full persuasion is, that Γεργισ. was at least the reading of St. Matthew's Hebrew Gospel, and at first that of his Greek Gospel; though Γερασσηνῶν and Γερασαίων might have been brought in from the cause above adverted to; but that in no long time after the publication of the Gospels of St. Mark and St. Luke, Γαδαρ. was introduced into a few copies, and from them into the Peasch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions, as being a reading thought more consonant with strict propriety as to topography, since the town of Gergesa was within the territory of the Gadarenes; and, accordingly, its inhabitants might more properly be termed Gadarenes, though if called from the district in which it was situated, Gergesenes. Even Mr. Alford concludes with the unwilling admission,—'We cannot say that a part of the territory of Gad. may not have been known to those who, like St. Matthew, were locally intimate with the shores of the Lake, by this ancient, and now generally disused, name.' Having, I trust, rescued Origen's name from the foul imputation of corrupting the written word, and shown that the reading Γεργ. is not based on falsehood, but, as appears from the almost universal consent of the MSS., on truth.—it may be worth while to rescue Origen's language from misconception, and his phraseology from corruption. Now the intent of Origen in the passage brought forward by Mr. Alford, was to review the three readings even then existing in the copies,—namely, Γερασ., Γαδαρ., and Γεργ. In doing this, he shows that the first reading is wholly baseless, and then introduces the second, Γαδ.; and after noticing that it is found in a few copies, he makes the remark, καὶ πρὸς τούτο λεκτέον, which words are passed over by all the Critics because they could not understand their meaning; and no wonder, for they are, I doubt not, corrupt. I propose to read καὶ πρ. τούτο, or τούτω, στικτέον, and thus all will be quite intelligible; and so I believe Origen wrote. Accordingly, the sense will be,—'And to this, too, we must place the mark of rejection;' = 'this, too, is to be rejected' (a use of the term easily arising out of the use of στίξιν in the sense to brand; as Hdut. vii. 139, στίγματα στίξιν τινα, from which came the figurative sense, 'to mark as of suspected genuineness;' which use of brand is found also in our own language). Then, after showing why the above reading cannot be admitted,—urging a reason which, as we have seen, is well founded,—he proceeds to notice the third reading (that in which he finally acquiesces), in the words ἀλλὰ Γεργισσα ἀφ' ἧς οἱ Γεργ., &c., of which we may make out the general, though not the exact sense intended by Origen;—and no wonder, since the introductory ones are manifestly corrupt. They must have been intended to express his adoption of Γεργ. as the true reading; but they are too brief to admit of such a sense being fixed, and the construction is a perfect cul de sac. Now to supply that which the MSS. of Origen do not furnish, we must have recourse to the text of Victor Antiochenus (of the fifth century), in his Catena on Mark, where he gives a compressed citation of Origen's words, making his intent therein more distinct, and moulding it into better shape. He commences with the general remark, οὐτε Γαδαρηνῶν οὐτε Γερασσηνῶν τὰ ἀκριβῆ ἔχει τῶν ἀντιγράφων, ἀλλὰ Γεργισσηνῶν, and then, after introducing Origen's words on Γαδαρ.

and Γερ., he subjoins,—Γέργεςα τοίνυν ἰστὶν, ἀφ' ἧς οἱ Γέργεςοι, πόλις ἀρχαία, &c., as in Origen. Hence we may infer that Origen wrote ἀλλὰ Γέργ. ἰστὶν, ἀφ' ἧς, &c., where ἀλλὰ has a strongly adversative force, as noting the opposition and contrariety of the foregoing two false readings to the true reading thus propounded. The full sense intimated is,—‘But the true place intended is Gergesa.’ How often ἰστὶ has been lost in the writings of antiquity by the carelessness of scribes, Critics well know. Or may we suppose that the false word λεκτίον, which crept in a little before, really belongs here? I need scarcely add, that these words testify to the existence of a Gergesa at or near the site of the ancient Gergesa in the time of Origen; and that is, we have seen, confirmed by several other weighty authorities: so that no room is left for Mr. Alford's “doubt whether such a city as Gergesa ever existed near the Lake.” On the contrary, that it did exist in the time of Christ, and some centuries after, we have sufficient proof—proof so circumstantial, that we are almost enabled to determine the site, which I believe to have been on the crown of the Anti-hippos, and about four miles N.N.W. from Gadara; so, however, that the cliff, down which the swine were hurled, was nearer by three miles to Gergesa than to Gadara; and accordingly, the site of the rock itself may, with more correct chorographical knowledge than we now possess, be pretty nearly fixed.

καὶ Σιδῶνος ἡλθε] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit ἡλθε διὰ Σιδῶνος, from B, D, L, Δ, and 2 cursive MSS.; but wrongly, considering that the vast preponderance of external authority for the text. rec. is confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. and Pers. Versions, and by internal evidence,—since ἡλθε διὰ Σιδῶνος seems an altered reading, probably by the same Critics as those who removed καὶ Σιδῶνος supra v. 24, nearly the same MSS. being adduced for each. It is quite plain that the reading at v. 29, and at v. 31, is a matter closely connected; so that we must either retain the text. rec. at both, or adopt the new reading at both; and I must confess that the latter is greatly preferable. As to the actual course taken on this occasion, I have no doubt that our Lord and his disciples, after leaving the Border-land of Tyre and Sidon, mentioned in note supra v. 24, and crossing first the Vallis Libani, and then the range of the Antilibanus, descended into the valley of the Jordan, crossing it near Dan (now Kankabé), and then traversed the left bank along that part of the districts of Peræa—Argob and Gaulonitis—which stretches along the Jordan, until they came to the Sea of Galilee at Bethsaida Gaulonitis, at the N.E. of that sea, mentioned in Luke ix. 10 (comp. Matt. xiv. 13, seq.), John vi. 1. ii. 5—13, xvii. 22, 24, et al. Now though Mark calls the above tract of country by a name we should not expect, Decapolis, yet that is confirmed by Matt. iv. 25, ἠκολούθησαν αὐτῷ ὄχλοι πολλοὶ ἀπὸ τῆς Γαλιλαίας (i. e. Upper Galilee) καὶ Δεκαπόλεως (meaning the country trans Jordanum), and opposite to Upper Galilee), καὶ Ἰεροσολύμων καὶ Ἰουδαίας, καὶ πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου,—meaning the country on the other side of Jordan to Judæa, and more usually called Peræa. As to the above tract of country being called by Mark and Matthew Decapolis, though it seems at variance with Pliny II. N. v. 17, yet it is confirmed by Ptolemy, who comprehends the Decapolis in the southern part of Cæle Syria; though, considering that he enumerates the same eight cities mentioned by Pliny (namely, Scythopolis, Hippos, Gadara, Deum, Pella, Gerasa, Philadelphia, Canatha), and subjoins Capitolias and Adraa, he may, while comprehending the Decapolis in the southern part of Cæle Syria, have intended his words to be applied to the upper part of the Decapolis. And it is probable that, in the time of our Lord and that of Pliny, there was a division of the Decapolis into the Upper (the country lying East of the Jordan and North of the Lake of Tiberias) and the Lower, comprehending the country lying South of the Lake,—all of it, however, lying East of the Jordan (excepting Scythopolis). It would seem that this Upper Decapolis was usually considered the Decapolis proper, it being the only part that forms a compact territory. The authority of Ptolemy in assigning Decapolis to the southern part of Cæle Syria is confirmed by STRABO, l. xvii., who, treating of Cæle Syria, evidently reckons this Upper part of the Decapolis (though he does not mention the name of Decapolis) with the southern part of Cæle Syria; and since he lived and wrote at the very same time as our Evangelists, there can be no doubt that the account given by St. Mark and St. Matthew of the then Decapolis is quite exact. This, too, is confirmed by Euseb., who says in his Tract de Locis Sacris,—Δεκάπολις ἐν Εὐαγγελίοις, αὐτὴ εἰσὶν ἡ ἐπὶ Περæια, καὶ μὲν ἀμφὶ τὸν Ἰσραὴλ καὶ Πέλλαν καὶ Γαδάρων, where for Πέλλαν I suspect should be read Ἀβιλαν; unless it be thought proper to cancel it as from the margin; for I can hardly suppose that Euseb. could mean to join it with Ἰσραὴλ and Γαδ., being so far apart from them, and being far beyond the boundaries of Upper Decapolis. If we suppose our Lord to have taken his course, as he must, in passing from Sidon to his destination, straight across the Antilibanus, and the mountain-chain of Hermon; then passing along that chain, and, through Canatha, to its s. extremity, and then passing the N. point of the Lake of Genesaret to Bethsaida, his course may truly be said to have been through Decapolis: repect, if, with Pliny, we include in the cities of Decapolis, Damascus; and Ptolemy includes Decapolis in the s. part of Cæle Syria. So that, in point of fact, the route was not so circuitous as it has been thought; and there might be many reasons, which we are left to divine, why our Lord chose it.
